

J'Aime C. Jennings, PhD is an Associate Professor in the Department of Health Services Administration, and Program Director of the residential format of the Master of Science in Health Administration (MSHA) degree. She received her Ph.D. in Health Services Administration with a concentration in Strategic Management from UAB and also holds a Bachelor of Business Administration degree in Economics from the University of Georgia and a Master of Public Administration degree from the University of West Georgia. Dr. Jennings' research interests include the integration of public health and health care through collaborative relationships, and studying how organizations identify and implement strategic initiatives to improve quality and access to healthcare. From 2017-2022, Dr. Jennings served as the Co-Director for the University of Louisville's Center for Health Organization Transformation supported by the National Science Foundation. She has continued this momentum at UAB by fostering collaborations with scholars both nationally and internationally, while building new educational initiatives within the MSHA degree program that strengthen student outcomes.
