November 2011

Dear Colleagues,

As National Women's Studies Association president and conference co-chair, I am happy to welcome you to Feminist Transformations. Feminist Transformations will extend the conversations begun in the past two years by NWSA on “Difficult Dialogues” by exploring how we as feminists and women's studies scholars are transforming the academy—even as it experiences its own transformation—and how it has also transformed us; how we understand and assess the limitations and inroads we have made in transforming our relationship to traditional disciplines; and how we continue the struggle to make social justice a central aim of our scholarship and a core value of this society.

We know that such concerns demand our urgent attention, especially as we gather to meet in Atlanta, Georgia, where recent anti-immigrant legislation will undoubtedly limit immigrants' rights to social justice as well as basic human rights; we view this law as one that conflicts with our feminist values and commitments. We have chosen to use our time here to raise our individual and collective voices to speak out against oppressive measures like HB 87 because we believe education and action are important steps in mobilizing opposition to such policies throughout the U.S. I encourage you to support the work of local organizers who will be present at the conference and take part in sessions that reflect our response to both local and national anti-immigration policies.

The program committee and staff have worked hard to proved a dynamic program, which I hope you will find both challenging and enjoyable. I remain excited about NWSA's future and the role you can play in its growth, and once again I welcome you to the conference.

Sincerely,

Bonnie Thornton Dill

RUTH WILSON GILMORE, a professor of geography in the doctoral program in earth and environmental sciences, is known as an activist as well as an intellectual and is the past president of the American Studies Association (ASA).

She examined how political and economic forces produced California’s prison boom in Golden Gulag: Prisons, Surplus, Crisis, and Opposition in Globalizing California (University of California Press, 2007), which was recognized by ASA with its Lora Romero First Book Award.

Gilmore’s wide-ranging research interests also include race and gender, labor and social movements, uneven development, and the African diaspora. She works regularly with community groups and grassroots organizations and is known for the broad accessibility of her research. She holds a Ph.D. in economic geography and social theory from Rutgers University.

Feminist Philosophers: In Their Own Words provides educators and scholars with in-depth, digitally filmed interviews with many of the scholars who generated and initially sustained feminist philosophy in North America. These two-hour DVDs provide an excellent introduction to the philosophical approaches of these theorists, as well as assisting scholars in understanding the ways in which social movements (such as the civil rights, anti-war, and women’s movements of the 1960s and 1970s) influenced academic scholarship.

MAKING UP THE DIFFERENCE: WOMEN, BEAUTY, AND DIRECT SELLING IN ECUADOR

Author: Erynn Masi de Casanova

Friday, November 11
10:50 am - 12:05 pm
Augusta

This first in-depth study of a cosmetics direct selling organization in Latin America uses women's experiences of informal employment to illuminate our understandings of work and gender, offering an analysis of the global and local economic conditions that make selling cosmetics an appealing option.

Author Biography

Erynn Masi de Casanova is Assistant Professor of Sociology and a Faculty Affiliate of Women's Gender, and Sexuality Studies at the University of Cincinnati. She has been conducting research in Ecuador for a decade, and her work has been published in journals such as Gender & Society, Women's Studies Quarterly, and Latino Studies. Her research and teaching interests include gender, family, globalization, qualitative research methods/ethnography, and sociology of the body. She is the recipient of NWSA's 2010 Sara A. Whaley Book Prize.

Gendered Citizenships is the product of collective scholarship undertaken by the Gender and Cultural Citizenship Working Group. It explores the ways in which, feminist conceptualizations of intersectionality, feminist approaches to citizenship and ethnographic studies of cultural citizenship allow us to reframe our thinking about knowledge production, political activism, and culture.

Participating Editor Biographies

Tracy Fisher is an assistant professor in the Department of Women's Studies at the University of California, Riverside. Her research lies at the intersections of Women's, Gender and Feminist studies, critical Race and Ethnic studies, African Diaspora studies, and critical Anthropology. She is the author of What's Left of Blackness? (Forthcoming from Palgrave) a book that analyzes the political transformations in black women's socially engaged community-based political work alongside shifts in the deployment of blackness as a political imaginary in England from the late 1960s until the 2000s. She is a co-editor of Gendered Citizenships: Transnational Perspectives on Knowledge Production, Political Activism, and Culture (Palgrave 2009). She has published journal articles in Small Axe, Social Justice, and Critical Sociology; and, she has received fellowships and grants from the Rockefeller Foundation and the Mellon Foundation.

Kia Lilly Caldwell is an associate professor in the Department of African and Afro-American Studies and adjunct associate professor in the Department of Anthropology at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. She has conducted research on questions of race, gender, and social activism in Brazil since 1994. Her book Negras in Brazil: Re-envisioning Black Women, Citizenship, and the Politics of Identity was published by Rutgers University Press in 2007. She is a co-editor of Gendered Citizenships: Transnational Perspectives on Knowledge Production, Political Activism, and Culture, which was published by Palgrave in 2009. Dr. Caldwell has published journal articles in Frontiers, Transforming Anthropology, The Journal of Negro Education, and leading women's studies journals in Brazil. Her current research focuses on HIV prevention for black women and black young adults in North Carolina and on the dynamics of race, gender, and public policy in Brazil. DIGITAL DEAD END: FIGHTING FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE IN THE INFORMATION AGE

AUTHOR: VIRGINIA EUBANKS

Saturday, November 12
10:50 am - 12:05 pm
Augusta

The idea that technology will pave the road to prosperity has been promoted through boom and bust. Today we are told that broadband access, high-tech jobs, and cutting-edge science will pull us out of our current economic downturn and move us toward social equality. In Digital Dead End, Virginia Eubanks argues that to believe this is to engage in a kind of magical thinking: a technological utopia will come about simply because we want it to. This vision of the miraculous power of high-tech development is driven by flawed assumptions about race, class, gender, citizenship and politics. The realities of the information age are more complicated, particularly for poor and working-class women and families.

One of the questions addressed by the book, which is based on four years of participatory action research with women living in the YWCA community of Troy, NY, is how engaged scholarship can both support progressive social movements and create better knowledge. This Author-Meets-Critics session will be focused on how, in the context of the growing immigrants’ rights struggle in Georgia and beyond, NWSA members can become more informed allies and more effective forces for social, economic and political change.

Author Biography

Virginia Eubanks is a founding member of Our Knowledge, Our Power (OKOP), a grassroots anti-poverty and welfare rights organization, and teaches in the Department of Women's Studies at the University at Albany, SUNY. She edited the cyberfeminist 'zine Brillo and was active in the community technology center movements in the San Francisco Bay Area and Troy, NY. SPIRITUAL MESTIZAJE: RELIGION, GENDER, RACE AND NATION IN CONTEMPORARY CHICANA NARRATIVE

AUTHOR: THERESA DELGADILLO

Saturday, November 12
12:55 - 2:10 pm
Augusta

In this volume, Delgadillo contends that spiritual mestizaje is central to Anzaldúa’s life and thought, and that it provides a critical framework for interpreting contemporary Chicana narratives. Defining spiritual mestizaje as a transformative process involving a radical, sustained critique of oppression, and a renewed engagement with the sacred, Delgadillo analyzes the concept in Anzaldúa’s work and in relation to existing theologies and theories of oppressions. Reading contemporary Chicana narratives, she critically examines the literary and visual technologies through which Chicana novels and documentary films engage spiritual mestizaje. In powerful cultural critiques, Chicanas offers alternative visions of spirituality as they challenge normative categories of gender, sexuality, nation, and race. Well-known scholars and critics of Women’s Studies, Chicano/a Studies and Religious Studies will discuss this volume in light of debate and research in these three fields.

Author Biography

Theresa Delgadillo’s research and teaching focuses on three areas: gender, religion and ethnicity; Latino/as in the Midwest; Afro Latin America and Afro-Latinidad. Her objects of study include literature, visual culture, performance, music. She has published on all these topics in journals and edited volumes. She is currently at work on a volume of Latina oral history of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and ongoing research on Afro-Latinidad.

NWSA RESPONDS TO HB 87

NWSA leaders and conference organizers believe that the anti-immigration legislation in Georgia, HB 87, will undoubtedly limit immigrants’ rights to social justice as well as basic human rights; we view this law as one that conflicts with our feminist values and commitments. We also believe that oppressive measures like HB 87 can be addressed through education and action, and we plan to address the issues driving HB 87 and the struggle against it at our conference. Our conference theme, “Feminist Transformations,” speaks directly to the potential of feminist organizing to challenge anti-immigrant and xenophobic legislation reflected in HB 87 and similar measures nationally.

We are pleased to announce a series of conference speakers, sessions, events, and actions that reflect our response to the legislation.

REPRESENTATIVE STACEY ABRAMS WELCOME
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 7 PM Grand Ballroom
Stacey Y. Abrams is the House Minority Leader for the Georgia General Assembly and State Representative for the 84th House District. She is the first woman to lead either party in the Georgia General Assembly and is the first African-American to lead the House of Representatives. Abrams received her J.D. from the Yale Law School. She graduated from the LBJ School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas at Austin with an M.P.Aff. in public policy. She earned a B.A. in Interdisciplinary Studies (Political Science, Economics and Sociology) from Spelman College, magna cum laude.

Abrams has spoken forcefully against HB 87. She has pointed out that this bill would cause the moral blindness, the social ostracization of legal immigrants and economic paralysis across the state.

LUNCHTIME TRAININGS WITH SOMOS GEORGIA/WE ARE GEORGIA ORGANIZERS
FRIDAY AND SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11-12, 12:05-12:55 PM Valdosta
Meet with local organizers to learn about the scope and impact of HB 87, its relationship to similar measures nationally, as well as how you can make a difference.

RESISTING ANTI-IMMIGRATION BACKLASH: FEMINISTS RESPOND TO HB 87 AND BEYOND
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 7-9 PM Grand Ballroom
Featuring Laura Briggs, Michelle Lapointe, Anna Sampaio

Laura Briggs (University of Massachusetts), Michelle Lapointe (Southern Poverty Law Center), Anna Sampaio (Santa Clara University) will consider immigration from historical, political, public policy, and legal perspectives in light of recent anti-immigrant legislation in Georgia and nationally.
NWSA CONFERENCE AS SANCTUARY ZONE
The National Women's Studies Association has agreed to become a Somos Georgia Sanctuary Zone for the duration of the conference. A Sanctuary Zone is a place where people can gather to work towards the well-being of all communities, and a place that can provide a place of sanctuary for the persecuted.

NWSA SUPPORT FOR THE BUY SPOT CAMPAIGN
NWSA will distribute to all conference attendees a Somos Georgia Buy Spot list. Buy Spots are businesses that welcome immigrants of all statuses, and that pledge to not allow police to enter their premises for the sole purpose of checking immigration status.

NWSA SUPPORT FOR LOCAL ORGANIZERS
NWSA will provide exhibit hall booth space for Somos Georgia/We Are Georgia organizers. Visit them in the exhibit hall to learn more about their work.

WOMEN'S STUDIES AND/AS CIVIC ENGAGEMENT: RESEARCH AND RECOMMENDATIONS FROM THE NWSA TEAGLE FOUNDATION GRANT PROJECT

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 9:00-10:15 AM Georgia 2,3,4
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 10:50 AM -12:05 PM Georgia 9

Featuring Karen Leong, Catherine Orr, and Theresa White

Karen Leong (Arizona State University), Catherine Orr (Beloit College), and Theresa White (California State University, Northridge) will discuss the results of a two-year National Women's Studies Association project funded with generous support from The Teagle Foundation. Women's Studies has drawn on its activist roots in the women's, civil rights, and student movements of 1960s and 1970s to grapple with the intellectual and practical at work in the context of what is widely known now as "civic engagement," arguably one of the very center pieces of liberal arts learning. The session will address the ways that women's studies can both support and critically engage higher education's mandate to produce more engaged citizens, focusing on highlights from the Teagle Working Group's white paper and suggestions for curriculum design.

FIRST-TIME ATTENDEE INFORMATION

You are not alone! Almost half of all National Women’s Studies Association 2011 conference registrants are attending this event for the first time.

Here are some ideas about how to make the most of your conference experience.

NWSA STAFF AND LEADERS CAN HELP

National Women’s Studies Association staff are available at registration on the conference floor to assist with questions large and small. Do not hesitate to bring questions or concerns to their attention and they will do their best to assist you.

NWSA GOVERNING COUNCIL members serve on the organization’s board of directors and are eager to make your conference experience positive and to cultivate future organization leadership. They can be identified by special ribbons attached to their badges—stop anyone to ask questions, share ideas, or learn more about leadership in NWSA.

ATTEND A BUSINESS MEETING

Caucus, task force, and interest group meetings are a good entry point for learning about specific constituencies within NWSA and for brainstorming about future conference planning. Often business meetings focus on what the constituent group intends to put forward for its sponsored conference session in the coming year.

IDENTIFY PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT OPPORTUNITIES

This may mean talking with acquisitions editors in the exhibit hall, attending special conference sessions, or grabbing coffee with a presenter who reframed your thinking about your own research. The conference offers many opportunities—scheduled and unscheduled—for you to make new connections and explore ideas.

009. Quiet Room - Thursday
9 am to 5 pm  •  Level 3: Executive Boardroom

010. PAD/WCC/WomCLP Women's Studies and/as Civic Engagement: Research and Recommendations from the NWSA Teagle Foundation Grant Project
9 to 10:15 am  •  Level 1: Georgia 2 & 3 & 4
Karen Leong (Arizona State University), Catherine Orr (Beloit College), and Theresa White (California State University, Northridge) will discuss the results of a two-year National Women's Studies Association project funded with generous support from The Teagle Foundation. Women's Studies has drawn on its activist roots in the women's, civil rights, and student movements of 1960s and 1970s to grapple with the intellectual and practical work in the context of what is widely known now as 'civic engagement,' arguably one of the very center pieces of liberal arts learning. The session will address the ways that women's studies can both support and critically engage higher education's mandate to produce more engaged citizens, focusing on highlights from the Teagle Working Group's white paper and suggestions for curriculum design.

Presenters:
Karen Leong, Arizona State University
Catherine M. Orr, Beloit College
Theresa Renee White, California State University, Northridge

Moderator:
Allison Kimmich, National Women's Studies Association

011. PAD: Chairs and Directors Workshop
10:25 to 11:40 am  •  Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV
In this workshop, a panel of experienced women's studies chairs and directors offers advice, fields questions, and participates in dialogue with audience members to address pressing questions of women's studies administration.

Presenters:
Alison Piepmeier, College of Charleston
Jill M. Adams, Jefferson Community and Technical College
Jill M. Bystydzienski, Ohio State University
Maria Bevacqua, Minnesota State University, Mankato
Phyllis D. Baker, University of Northern Iowa

Moderator:
Susan M. Shaw, Oregon State University

012. PAD: The Past as Prologue: Annual Reports as Strategic Tools for Program Development
10:25 to 11:40 am  •  Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV
We know that annual reports serve multiple purposes—defining accomplishments, data collection to see trends, reflection and goal setting, accountability to constituents—but actually writing one is often daunting. For directors and administrators of women and gender studies programs they can also lay the groundwork for new hires, additional funding, and program growth. Participants in this workshop will be asked to bring examples of course development, staff, program, strategic plans, budgets, and laptops. Working with colleagues experienced in writing annual reports, at the end of the session you will have a draft of your 2011-12 report.

Presenters:
Mary Alice Gibson, University of North Carolina Greensboro
DeVeanna S. Fulton Minor, University of Alabama
Coral Wayland, University of North Carolina Charlotte

Moderator:
Kathleen Underwood, Grand Valley State University

013. PAD: And It Continues... Dealing with Tenure and Promotion Challenges in Women and Gender Studies
10:25 to 11:40 am  •  Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV
Women and Gender Studies directors often face challenges when coming up for tenure and promotion: their "home" department requires research and teaching independent of women's studies; committee members are either blatantly biased against women's studies or demonstrate implicit bias; standards become fluid. This panel, comprised of members of Feminists Against Academic Discrimination, will discuss their experiences and provide their expert advice.

Presenters:
Sharon Leder, Feminists Against Academic Discrimination
Betty J. Harris, University of Oklahoma, Norman
Ann Burnett, North Dakota State University

Moderator:
Ann Burnett, North Dakota State University
014. PAD: Balancing Work and Life
10:25 to 11:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Redefining Success in the Academy and Life: the Adjunct Route
Elizabeth Anne Hubbard, University of Montana
The traditional academic route to success involves attending graduate school, completing the Ph.D., entering the job market, and getting a tenure-track position at an accredited university. Some feminist scholars are seeing their “choice” to not pursue a tenure-track position as a conscious political statement, as a refusal to “use the master’s tools to dismantle the master’s house.” This talk will look at how perennial adjunct status can offer opportunities: 1) freedom of research and teaching; 2) more time for family and outside interests; and 3) choice of geographical location. It will also address the important challenges of that status: 1) lack of respect from the “master’s house;” 2) lack of financial stability; and 3) lack of job security. Ultimately, this talk will theorize one professor’s path to her own brand of academic success and situate that path within the wider framework of current feminist pedagogy and theory.

Redefining Success on the Job Market
Abigail Louise Palko, University of Notre Dame
This panel will discuss some of the calculations she made when job-hunting in 2008-09 (ABD) and 2009-10 (defended and ready to graduate) as a married woman with a toddler. In the process, she created for herself a new definition of “success on the job market.” She will consider the ways that her committee and graduate school responded to her decisions, and start to tease out how we might juxtapose the traditional model of academic success against a more life-friendly model.

How Many Hours are in a Day?: Considering The Work We Assign Outside the Classroom
Jill Elizabeth Eichhorn, Austin Peay State University
This panel will reflect on the origins of the 12-18 hour semester and the lives of those students in contrast with students we teach today. Specifically, she will consider how many hours are available in a day if we sleep eight hours, cook and eat well, exercise, take time for family and friends, attend and prepare for class. She will discuss implications of homework outside class work for in-class discussions and participation.

Moderator:
Peggy Rivage-Seul, Berea College

015. WomCLP: “When I Dare to be Powerful:” Leadership Development Workshop
10:25 to 11:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 14
This panel will provide time to reflect on individual strengths and growing edges we have as leaders, as well as time to provide and receive feedback around developing leadership skills and specific leadership styles.

016. WCC: Career Advancement for Women’s Center Professionals: Transitions, Trajectories, and Tips for Success
10:35 to 11:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 2 & 3 & 4
Women’s Center professionals possess a wide variety of disciplinary backgrounds and previous job experiences. However, we often lack clear, comprehensive examples of how to advance our careers in thoughtful, strategic ways. This panel provides the opportunity to hear from those who have made transitions to a variety of different positions in Women’s Center staffing and beyond. Panelists will share their career paths and success strategies moving from program coordinator to assistant director, from assistant director to director, from director to assistant dean, and everything between. Audience members will be encouraged to ask questions, share their experiences, and network with one another.

Presenters:
Lamea Shaaban-Magana, University of Alabama
Jessica Caldwell-O’Keefe, Boise State University
Colleen Riggle, Georgia Institute of Technology
Susan Marine, Harvard University
Moderator:
Adale Sholock, West Chester University of Pennsylvania

017. WCC: Feminist Activism Development: A Balancing Act in Preventing Intimate Partner Violence and Promoting Healthy Dating Behaviors
10:25 to 11:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
This workshop will explore and discuss issues around student development as feminist activists and leaders on campus. In Women’s Centers our work a balancing act of supporting, teaching and developing students as agents of change. In this workshop I will use my experience coordinating and facilitating our Women’s Center year-long undergraduate student feminist activist program as an example. I will share the questions, challenges, hopes and successes from this program and learn from others.

Moderator:
Kim A Fulbright, University of Cincinnati

018. WCC: How Women’s Centers Can Advance Bystander Intervention in Preventing Intimate Partner Violence and Promoting Healthy Dating Behaviors
10:25 to 11:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
1 in 5 college students report violence by a current intimate partner. This workshop will examine the use of bystander intervention as an effective prevention strategy to address sexual and intimate partner violence on campus and promote healthy dating behaviors. Participants will explore how a bystander intervention campaign encourages individual changes in behavior and larger collaborative approaches to address intimate partner violence on campus. Specific attention will be given to discussing how Women’s Centers can broaden and strengthen their collaborative partnerships to address and prevent intimate partner violence on campus.

Presenters:
Jen Underwood, Virginia Tech
Kate McCord, Virginia Sexual and Domestic Violence Action Alliance
Liz Cascone, Virginia Sexual and Domestic Violence Action Alliance

019. Pre-Conference Lunch
11:40 am to 12:55 pm • Level 2: Garden Courtyard

Presenters:
Chimi L. Boyd-Keyes, North Carolina Central University
Vivien Ng, University at Albany
Aimee Carrillo Rowe, University of Iowa

020. PAD: From Program to Department: Transitional Challenges in Organization and Curriculum
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV
Moderator:
Vivien Ng, University at Albany
PARTICIPANTS:

022. PAD: Writing for the Popular Press: A Workshop for Feminist Scholars
12:55 to 3:35 pm - Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV
More than ever, there is a critical need for feminist scholars to advance public knowledge and debate by making women's studies and feminist scholarship more accessible to a mass audience. In this writing workshop, editors of a feminist magazine and blog, along with women's studies scholars who have published in feminist and mainstream media, will provide NWSA scholars with essential tools to translate their research for a wider non-academic audience.

Presenters:
Janell Hobson, State University of New York, Albany
Audrey Bilger, Claremont McKenna College
Aviva Dove-Viebahn, University of Northern Colorado
Michele Kort, Ms. Magazine
Jessica Stites, Ms. Magazine

Moderator:
Katherine Spillar, Ms. Magazine

023. PAD: Building, Structuring, Sustaining Small Programs: Thinking Through the "Identity Project" of Women's Studies
12:55 to 2:10 pm - Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV
Small programs often face unique hurdles to structuring and sustaining themselves as viable and coherent academic units. One of the major issues is that of "identity": defining a Women's Studies program when it is often composed mostly of cross listed courses from a variety of other disciplines and departments, and staffed by faculty with varying degrees of knowledge about (and sometimes even interest in) WS as an academic field. This roundtable will explore some of the issues that arise in facing and addressing this question of identity or self-definition and offer some effective strategies and processes for addressing them.

Presenters:
Ann Braithwaite, University of Prince Edward Island
Catherine M. Orr, Beloit College
Astrid Henry, Grinnell College

024. Every Semester Needs a Plan
12:55 to 5 pm - Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV
The Every Semester Needs A Plan Workshop is specifically designed to address these questions by teaching participants how to create a semester plan. Specifically, participants learn to: identify personal and professional goals for the semester; create a strategic plan to accomplish their goals; identify the types of community, support and accountability they need to execute their plan. Every participant walks out of the workshop with a clear work plan for their semester that can be immediately shared with their department chair and mentors.

Presenter:
Kerry Ann Rockquemore, National Center for Faculty Development & Diversity

025. WomCLP: Words of Wisdom Panel: Challenges and Opportunities Along the Career Journey
12:55 to 2:10 pm - Level 1: Georgia 14
This panel will feature women of color from a variety of positions in higher education who have successfully navigated a variety of challenges. Focus will be on providing participants with practical advice related to career and work/life balance.
026. WCC: She's Got Moxie: Connecting Women's History to Activism Today
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 4
The Moxie Project connects women's history to current social change efforts through curricular, co-curricular and civic engagement experiences. We will discuss how this yearlong program integrates theory and practice as students move from the classroom to internships in women's organizations and back to campus for a capstone seminar. We will share ideas about the power of history to increase student's sense of agency and political activism and the benefits of moving in and out of the classroom through a faculty/Women's Center partnership with community organizations. We will open up a conversation about possibilities for further program development.

Presenters:
Ada Gregory, Duke University
Rachel F Seidman, Duke University

027. WCC: Common Missions, Linked Arms: Preparing Students for Life and Leadership After Graduation
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 5 - AV
Many of today's women college students are woefully unprepared for the discrimination they will likely experience after graduation. Women's Centers are uniquely positioned to help them understand that gender-based discrimination is still an issue, and then equip them to overcome its effects. Participants will hear from colleagues about Elect Her Campus Women Win, a program that inspires and trains college women to run for student government; Start Smart, a salary negotiation workshop for college women entering the job market; and Campus Action Projects, financial grants and leadership opportunities for student and faculty/staff teams to implement current women's equity research.

Presenters:
Jessica Hitchins, University of Alabama, Tuscaloosa
Lisa S Rismiller, University of Dayton
Chimli L Boyd-Keyes, North Carolina Central University

Moderator:
Kate Farrar, American Association of University Women

028. WCC: Transforming the Conversation on Race: Strategies to Disrupt and Dismantle Racism and White Privilege
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
This session is an opportunity to discuss some of the challenges we face in moving forward with anti-racism and anti-white supremacy work in WNSA and on our campuses. This workshop will offer frameworks for thinking, explore case studies, and engage small group discussions to create productive conversation and action steps. Strategies will be based on the results of a February 2011 needs assessment, an evaluation of the 2010 pre-conference program, and the contributions of new voices in anti-racism/anti-white supremacy work. Participants encouraged to read: hooks, bell, "What Happens When White People Change." Teaching Community: A Pedagogy of Hope. New York: Routledge, 2003.

029. PAD: Building a WGS Program in a Chilly and Gust Environment
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Can we cope with a State Funding Crisis in a Chilly Political Climate and Still Thrive?
Karla Brent Hackstaff, Northern Arizona University
How do we do more with less without compromising our programs, especially those of overfunded? How do we recruit and retain students without turning WGS into a consumerist driven model of academics? These dilemmas are addressed by illustrating a couple of ways WGS has done more with less we are trying to raise its profile.

Coping with Limits from a Lecturer's Perspective
Arianne Lynne Burford, Northern Arizona University
How can we cope with partial funds through curricular, centers, and programming from ethnic studies, queer studies, and disability studies? What are the best ways to form coalitions with various student groups across campus and thus build more interest in and recognition for WGS both in terms of students and from the perspective of the university? Under conditions of time famine, how do we connect to the campus and larger community?

Working with Limits in an Unyielding Environment
Frances Julia Riener, Northern Arizona University
How are qualitative values of WGS sustained when head counts matter to administration? In a time of a growing undergraduate population, should programs raise caps to accommodate the numbers while compromising values in WGS? Can one raise consciousness in chilly political climates with meager economic resources?

Moderator:
Karla B. Hackstaff, Northern Arizona University
Collaborating to Develop Short-term Faculty-Led Feminist Study Abroad Experiences
Danielle DeMuth, Grand Valley State University
This presentation focuses on collaborative models to create short-term faculty-led feminist study abroad experiences ranging from short-term not-for-credit programs to six-week programs for credit. Using examples from four short-term programs, the presenter will discuss partnerships that focus on cultural immersion, service learning, and civic engagement in Nicaragua, Cuba, Egypt and South Africa as well as how such partnerships might be adapted to other sites and study abroad programs.

International Internship for Women in Costa Rica
Deanna Hutson Mihaly, Eastern Michigan University
This presentation gives an overview of the planning steps involved in international programming for WGST students. The work of securing funding and planning visit sites will be reviewed. The presenter will discuss in-process development of a cultural immersion experience in Costa Rica, consisting of fieldwork in the cloud forest at an eco-tourism center, under the direction of a biologist who will serve as both mentor and teacher to the visiting students. Details of the recently signed agreement between Eastern Michigan University and the Instituto Tecnológico of Cartago will be shared with participants.

031. PAD: Sticks in a Bundle: Creating Regional WGST Collaborations
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV
How do Women and Gender Studies (WGST) faculty residing in the margins of higher education deploy feminisms that use each other as strategies for stability and growth? This workshop introduces participants to the Greater Rochester Consortium (GRC) of WGST faculty, a collective of diverse WGST academics who work at separate colleges/universities but in close geographical proximity. The goal of the workshop is to offer participants the chance to develop hands-on strategies for constructing similar feminist collectives in their own regions, championing WGST’s interdisciplinary merit while capitalizing on the resources of differently positioned but geographically-linked WGST scholars.

Presenters:
Deborah Uman, St. John Fisher College
Maria Frances Brandt, Monroe Community College
Barbara LeSavoy, State University of New York, Brockport
Moderator:

032. WomCLP: “Sanctuaries and Fortresses:” Assessing Your Career Goals and Path
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Georgia 14
This workshop, in conjunction with the following session, will provide guided time to work on specific personal, career, departmental or institutional goals that participants want to bring to the session. Focus will be on goal clarification, problem-solving, and group collaboration.

032a. Jewish Caucus Business Meeting
2:20 – 3:45 pm • Georgia 1

033. WCC: Academic Women’s Centers: Careers, Professionalization and Structural Transformation
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Georgia 4
This roundtable will discuss points of tension in career paths for women’s center staff as well as opportunities to leverage our contributions to campuses more generally. Recent conversations about the increasing number of Ph.D.-prepared center directors expose disagreement about the need for the Ph.D. in these positions, as well as the consequences for younger center staff in terms of limiting potential career paths. In addition, attention to alternative academic career paths has been expanding, and proposals put forward about the ways in which universities might better support, develop, deploy, and recognize the contributions and potential contributions of Ph.D.-prepared non-faculty administrators.

Presenters:
Brenda Bethman, University of Missouri, Kansas City
Donna M. Bickford, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Gail E. Cohee, Brown University
Michelle N. Issadore, School and College Organization for Prevention Educators

Moderator:
Anitra D. Cottledge, University of Minnesota

034. WCC: Campus Climate Assessments: Subverting the “Master’s” Tools for Feminist Social Change
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Georgia 5 - AV
Many campuses engage in campus climate assessment projects in order to understand their institution’s unique challenges around issues of diversity and with the intention of making their institutions more welcoming and inclusive. As these surveys are typically designed to assess the wider population, what implications do these comprehensive assessments have specifically for women? This workshop will explore four diverse campus experiences with developing and implementing comprehensive campus climate assessment and how issues affecting women’s voice, institutional sexism and privilege and resulting outcomes were addressed. Workshop participants will have an opportunity to interact and discuss possible solutions.

Presenters:
Heather Shea Gasser, University of Idaho
Barbara Bonnekessen, New Mexico Tech
Ada Gregory, Duke University
Rita Michelle Jones, Lehigh University

035. Women’s Centers and the Trans Community: Building Feminist Solidarities
2:20 to 3:35 pm • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
Linking with the 2011 NWSA Conference theme "Deploying Feminisms," this workshop explores the intersections and tensions of trans feminisms and women’s center spaces. Beginning with a brief overview of trans issues, we will facilitate a conversation about the intersections of trans rights and feminist interests, reflecting on both commonalities and tensions. The workshop will explore what it means to be an effective trans ally in a women’s center, focusing especially on the following issues: programming, who is welcome in women’s center space, when, and for what reasons; vocabulary use and building trans-friendly community; and questions around authenticity and gender expression.

Presenter:
Susan Marine, Harvard University

Moderator:
Gina Helfrich, Harvard University
036. PAD Business Meeting
3:45 to 4:45 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV

037. WomCLP: Preparing the “Spawning Ground:” Strategic Planning for Your Vision
3:45 to 4:45 pm • Level 1: Georgia 14
This workshop will provide time for strategic planning around the specific goals identified in the previous session. Participants will be paired up with other participants with similar goals in order to leverage collaborative strategic planning.

038. WCC: Meet the WCC
3:45 to 4:45 pm • Level 1: Georgia 3

039. WomCLP: Day 1 Wrap-Up
4:45 to 5:30 pm • Level 1: Georgia 14

040. WCC: Awards and Closing
5 to 6 pm • Level 1: Georgia 3

041. WomCLP Reception
5:30 to 6:30 pm • Level 1: Georgia 14

042. Keynote: Ruth Wilson Gilmore
7 to 9 pm • Level 3: Grand Ballroom
Ruth Wilson Gilmore, a professor of geography in the doctoral program in earth and environmental sciences, is known as an activist as well as an intellectual and is currently president of the American Studies Association (ASA). She examined how political and economic forces produced California's prison boom in Golden Gulag: Prisons, Surplus, Crisis, and Opposition in Globalizing California (University of California Press, 2007), which was recognized by ASA with its Lora Romero First Book Award. Gilmore's wide-ranging research interests also include race and gender, labor and social movements, uneven development, and the African diaspora. She works regularly with community groups and grassroots organizations and is known for the broad accessibility of her research. She holds a Ph.D. in economic geography and social theory from Rutgers University.

Presenter:
Ruth Wilson Gilmore, The Graduate Center, City University of New York

043. Georgia Area College and University Sponsored Welcome Reception
9 to 11 pm • Level 2: Garden Courtyard
All conference attendees are welcome at this reception, generously sponsored by Georgia area colleges and universities.

OVERVIEW
Thursday 12:55 - 5 pm • Atlanta 5

- Are you tired of your deadline-driven, binge-and-bust writing routine?
- Have you thought lately about leaving the Academy because you just can't imagine how to be a professor without working 60-80 hours a week?
- Do you want structure, accountability, and support while you implement the best practices for academic time management and increasing writing productivity?

The Every Semester Needs A Plan Workshop is specifically designed to address these questions by teaching participants to create a semester plan. Specifically, participants learn to:

- Identify personal and professional goals for the semester
- Create a strategic plan to accomplish their goals
- Identify the types of community, support and accountability they need to execute their plan

Best of all, every participant walks out of the workshop with a clear work-plan for their semester that can be immediately shared with their department chair and mentors.

WORKSHOP FACILITATOR • KERRY ANN ROCKQUEMORE

Kerry Ann Rockquemore, PhD is Executive Director of the National Center for Faculty Development & Diversity. Her scholarship has focused on intersected families, biracial identity, and the politics of racial categorization. She is author of two books: Beyond Black and Raising Biracial Children, as well as over two dozen articles and book chapters on multiracial youth. After Dr. Rockquemore became tenured professor (at the University of Illinois at Chicago), her focus shifted to improving conditions for pre-tenure faculty by creating supportive communities for professional development, writing productivity and work/life balance. Her award-winning work with underrepresented faculty led to the publication of her most recent book: The Black Academic’s Guide to Winning Tenure Without Losing Your Soul. Through the NCFDD, Dr. Rockquemore provides workshops for new faculty at colleges across the United States, writes a weekly advice column for Inside Higher Education, and works with a select group of new faculty each semester in the NCFDD’s Faculty Success Program.

ABOUT THE BOOK PRIZES

NWSA GLORIA E. ANZALDÚA BOOK PRIZE

The prize honors Gloria Anzaldúa, a valued and long-active member of the National Women's Studies Association. The prize gives recognition for groundbreaking scholarship in women's studies that makes significant multicultural feminist contributions to women of color/transnational scholarship.

Deadline to apply for either award: May 1, each year.
For more details and to apply please visit: www.nwsa.org/awards/

NWSA SARA A. WHALEY BOOK PRIZE

Thanks to a generous bequest from Sara A. Whaley, NWSA will offer two $2,000 Sara A. Whaley book awards on the topic of women and labor. This prize honors Sara Whaley, who owned Rush Publishing and was the editor of Women's Studies Abstracts. Each year NWSA will award up to 2 book awards on the topic of women and labor.
A BRIEF (AND INCOMPLETE) HISTORY OF THE NWSA WOMEN OF COLOR CAUCUS

Participants in the 2007 NWSA Women of Color Caucus retreat discussed the central role women of color have played in NWSA history and activities, and wanted to establish a record of those contributions. Pat Washington and Nupur Chaudhuri have begun that work here.

The history of the Women of Color Caucus of the National Women's Studies Association is an inexorable and irrefutable part of the history of NWSA. From the Association's first national conference in 1979 (Lawrence, Kansas)—when the Women of Color Caucus drew its first breath as the “Third World Caucus”—to the landmark 1981 Storrs Conference (“Women Respond to Racism”); to the watershed 1990 Akron Conference where over a hundred women of color and their allies walked out to protest the Association's entrenched racism; to the "healing" presidencies of Vivien Ng and Betty Harris (1994 and 1997, respectively); to the 2000 Simmons Conference developed and delivered by the Caucus's advisor/benefactor/champion/mainstay Christina Brinkley; to the 2002 Las Vegas conference where the Women of Color Caucus and the then-newly-constituted Anti White Supremacy Task Force joined forces to agitate for the inclusion of perspectives and contributions of women of color in the Association's 25th anniversary celebration; down to the present time when the Women of Color Caucus and the Women of Color Leadership Project figure prominently in the Association's multi-year Ford Foundation capacity-building grant, the Women of Color Caucus has been a driving force within the Association.

The Caucus has benefited from the courage, persistence, and commitment of many “sturdy bridges” of all colors. Several such “bridges” are listed by name in the above highlights of Caucus history. However, there is a long succession of others, leading from the Association’s inaugural conference to the present day, and stretching well into the future.

Nupur Chaudhuri was present at the first national conference, where she recalls “many American women of color and other longtime U.S. residents were ‘congratulated’ by their white peers for ‘speaking good English’ or having ‘a good grasp of the subject matter.” Chaudhuri was elected that year as one of the Coordinating Council members of the fledgling Third World Caucus, and, in this role, she drafted guidelines for a more inclusive 1980 conference in Bloomington, as well as helped set the stage for the ground-breaking Storrs conference on racism in 1981. It was regarding the experience of women of color at this latter conference that Chela Sandoval would subsequently write, “To be ‘Third World’ meant... first, to have been de-centered from any point of power in order to be used as the negative pole against which the dominant powers can then define themselves [and] second, to be working politically to challenge the systems that keep power moving in its current patterns, thus shifting it onto new terrains....”

Sandoval's assessment of the dialectic between "Third World" women's status ("de-centered") and their purpose ("shifting power ... onto new terrains") captures the essence of what the Women of Color Caucus has been historically and what it strives to be today.

The Women of Color Caucus continues to offer our Association a singular opportunity to look within our own ranks to discover ways to promote broader inclusion of historical, social, cultural, political and economical perspectives of racialized women in the United States (and abroad). We do this in a variety of ways with a variety of supporters and allies. Recent examples include our work with Program Administration and Development to create the Women of Color Leadership Project, our work with the NWSA Journal to develop a cluster of articles by emerging and established women of color scholars, our work with ABAFAZI Journal to fund a women of color student essay award (subsequently expanded to several awards through the generous contributions of donors), our work with the Anti White Supremacy Task Force to present an annual “Stop Dreaming/Keep Working” workshop, and numerous other endeavors.

NWSA can be proud of this history of women of color, allies, and social justice advocates who have openly challenged, criticized, and moved the Association to live up to its mission.

Gender Equality Matters for Development

World Development Report 2012
Gender Equality and Development

The World Development Report 2012...

- Focuses on the economics of gender equality
- Draws on quantitative and qualitative data, including new field research with more than 4,000 men and women in 98 communities from 19 developing countries
- Analyzes how markets, formal institutions such as laws, and informal social institutions, such as norms, interact and influence household decision-making
- Builds on the view of development as a process of expanding freedoms equally for all individuals, and considers gender equality as a core development goal in itself
- Informs policy decisions by building on and synthesizing the growing body of multi-disciplinary theory, evidence, and data on how gender equality matters for development while highlighting the major knowledge gaps that remain

WORLD BANK Publications  The reference of choice on development
THEME 1: THE POLITICS OF CRISIS
The current historical moment demands an exploration of feminist understandings of and responses to crises, including, but not limited to natural and man-made disasters and conflicts such as Katrina, Haiti, 9-11, Burma, Congo, Darfur, and the current Economic/Political crisis in the U.S. and globally.

THEME 2: SUBVERTING THE “MASTER’S” TOOLS?
Questions surrounding methodology and methods have often been at the heart of feminist transformations in the academy. Engaging Audre Lorde’s important insight that “the master’s tools will never dismantle the master’s house,” feminists across disciplines and within women’s studies programs and departments for more than four decades have challenged conventional modes of knowledge production. They have exposed the inherent subjectivity of seemingly objective processes and analyses, troubled the epistemological and ontological worldviews at the heart of disciplinary practices, and pioneered innovative methods and theorizing in advancing feminist research and scholarship.

THEME 3: DEPLOYING FEMINISMS
The meaning and reach of feminism are under constant negotiation. On the one hand, feminist and other social movements have witnessed a recurring and ongoing co-optation of their history, key terms, and organizing tactics. Whether through Glenn Beck’s March on Washington on the anniversary of Martin Luther King Jr.’s historic “I Have a Dream Speech” or the 2008 Republican Vice-Presidential nominee Sarah Palin’s claiming the banner of feminism, the naming and framing strategies of women’s studies and progressive social activists remain contested terrain.

THEME 4: WOMEN’S STUDIES WITHOUT WALLS
Women’s studies has always sought to transgress barriers and constructions that separate the “ivory tower” from the “real world.” The explosion of feminist social networking and blogging is a notable reminder of both the interest in feminism and its longstanding engagements beyond the academy. Indeed, now, more than ever, women’s studies needs to affirm its understanding of itself as a knowledge formation that exceeds academic boundaries.

THEME 5: CREATIVE INTERVENTIONS
For feminists, art, music, literature, film, new media and other creative projects and forms have been vital in elaborating political ideas, building communities, and fomenting social change. Indeed, art has presented itself as another theatre of political power and expression, serving as an important means of political consciousness-raising and repository of historical memory.
SESSION FORMAT INFORMATION

PANELS provide an opportunity for examining specific problems or topics from a variety of perspectives given that they include 3-4 participants. Panels may present alternative solutions, interpretations, or contrasting points of view on a specified subject or in relation to a common theme. Panel members are expected to prepare papers addressing central questions described in the proposal.

INDIVIDUAL PAPER proposals are submitted individually and arranged into sessions by the Proposal Review Committee. In paper sessions, authors present 10-12 minute papers followed by audience discussion. A typical structure for a session with four papers allows approximately 5 minutes for the moderator to introduce the session, 10 minutes for each presenter, and 30 minutes for discussion.

SPONSORED SESSIONS may be submitted by NWSA Caucuses on topics of particular interest to caucus members and NWSA members as a whole. One sponsored session per caucus will be offered space in the Conference Program if submissions are received by the proposal deadline and proposals meet review criteria. Task forces and interest groups may also submit proposals for sponsored sessions.

ROUNDTABLES typically include a moderator and 4-6 presenters who make brief, informal remarks about a specific idea or project. They allow for extensive discussion and audience participation.

POSTER SESSIONS present research or analysis on a topic by combining graphics and text on a 4’x8’ board. The poster session presenter is available during an assigned session time in order to interact on a one-on-one basis with the attendees viewing the poster. A well-planned poster communicates its message in a visually and textually powerful way, allowing the attendee to grasp the information quickly.

WORKSHOPS provide an opportunity to exchange information or work on a common problem, project, or shared interest. Workshops are typically experientially oriented, grounded in some sort of women’s and gender studies research agenda, and include brief presentations that allow adequate time for reflective discussion and interaction.

A Note About Scheduling: NWSA staff and the program co-chairs have made every effort to organize the conference program taking into account thematic synergies while avoiding thematic conflicts. The schedule has been repeatedly reviewed and frequently re-organized to that end. Please note that some thematic conflicts are inevitable given the complexity and scope of the overall program.

Bringing We'Moon into the Classroom

The iconic feminist datebook and inspired collection of women's art and writing, celebrating 30 years of Women's Studies Without Walls.

"I have been using your calendar for years and years! Thank you for the incredible work We'Moon is doing... towards a more female-centered and woman-honoring world." — Alice Walker, author & activist

We'Moon 2012: Chrysalis

Exploring the transformative moment, invoking radical trust for times of deep change.

In the Spirit of We'Moon — Celebrating 30 Years An Anthology of We'Moon Art and Writing

Just out in paperback, artfully showcasing three decades of treasured art and writing, with stories of We'Moon's colorful evolution during an extraordinary period in women's history. A wonderful resource for classes in Women's Studies / Women's History / Women's Art / Women's Literature.

"There is nothing like this I have ever seen in print. A lineage, a sourcebook, a visual and literary spell of pages, the art is nothing short of oracular and the book reads like an unfolding of prayer." — Julie Weber, poet

IJFAB: International Journal of Feminist Approaches to Bioethics
Edited by Mary C. Rawlinson
The International Journal of Feminist Approaches to Bioethics (IJFAB) provides a forum within bioethics for feminist thought and debate on ethical issues related to health, health care, and the biomedical sciences.
Published semiannually
eISSN 1937-4577
piSSN 1937-4585

"Attention to gender in bioethics is not only an issue of equal rights for women; rather, rethinking ethics starting from women's experience produces new concepts and strategies more adequate to sustain human health and happiness."
Mary Rawlinson

Meridians, Feminism, race, transnationalism
Edited by Paula J. Giddings
Meridians provides a forum for the finest scholarship and creative work by and about women of color in U.S. and international contexts and recognizes that feminism, race, transnationalism, and women of color are contested terms and engages in a dialogue across ethnic and national boundaries.
Published semiannually
piSSN 1536-6936

"A central task of feminist scholarship is to provide new frameworks—and new applications of existing ones—that correct, explain, and analyze the gendered experiences of women across and within multiple cultural contexts."
Paula Giddings

Nashim, A Journal of Jewish Women's Studies & Gender Issues
Academic Editor: Renée Levine Metzger
Managing Editor: Deborah Greniman
Nashim provides an international, interdisciplinary academic forum in Jewish women's and gender studies. Each issue is theme-oriented, produced in consultation with a distinguished feminist scholar, and includes articles on literature, text studies, anthropology, archeology, theology, contemporary thought, sociology, the arts, and more.
Published semiannually
piSSN 8755-4178

"Since religion and culture are intertwined, critical feminist scholarship in religion seeks to change people's mindsets internalized in and through cultural customs, religious education, and preaching."
Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza

CHRONOLOGICAL PROGRAM DESCRIPTIONS

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11

044. Employment Services
9:00 am to 7:00 pm • Level 2: Athens

045. "That’s Not Racist, It’s Racial”: How Post-feminism Is Fucking Up Our Politics
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV

This interactive presentation will critically explore the ways in which post-feminism is navigated in university classrooms and popular culture, which falls under the "Deploying Feminisms" conference theme. Both presenters have a strong background in Women's Studies and will be using feminist scholarship to contextualize the ongoing address to address issues of power and privilege, specifically in interdisciplinary graduate classrooms and popular media like social networking sites, blogs, and mainstream news broadcasting. Presenters and participants will reflect upon these topics and personal experiences to facilitate dialogues around best practices that counteract the erasing, blaming, avoiding, and increasingly pervasive nature of post-feminism.

Presenters:
Ashley Boyd, San Diego State University
Nicholas Reyes Franco, University of San Diego

046. Crisis in Women’s Closets: Bill 94 and Full-face Veils in Quebec (Canada)
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
From Iran to Quebec: The Choice to (Un)Veil
Katrilt Aslani, University of Ottawa
Bill 94 has been proposed as a policy solution to the perceived cultural crisis of accommodating minorities in Quebec (Canada). This legislation makes seeing a woman’s face imperative. Speaker one will examine how over different periods of time, women in Iran have been coerced to both unveil and veil through legitimized force and codified laws. Using Iran as a comparative example, this paper will highlight how veils policies, which restrict choice, can render Muslim women’s well-being in crisis. Speaker one will juxtapose veil policies in Iran with Bill 94, to assess potential implications for Muslim women in Quebec.

Crisis Unveiled
Samantha Feder, University of Ottawa
Proponents of Bill 94 argue that Muslim women who wear full-face veils are threatening to Canadian society because they deprive other people of the ability to see their faces. Yet legislation which would render women socially invisible for refusing to unveil, has not been framed as equally threatening. Using a critical race lens, speaker two argues that Bill 94 puts citizenship rights in crisis by denying veiled Muslim women essential services such as employment, education and health care. Ultimately, this paper questions who defines a crisis and why seeing a Muslim woman’s face is more critical than social citizenship.

Dangerous Diversions: Muslim Women’s Bodies as Distractions from the Quebec Welfare State Crisis
Naira Tariq, University of Ottawa
Speaker three argues that Bill 94 was strategically proposed just days before the 2010 provincial budget. This tactic placed surveillance on Muslim women’s bodies rather than the eroding financial state of Quebec. Indeed, veiled Muslim women have become “sexual decoys,” diverting attention from the rise of privatization threatening Quebec’s welfare state. These figures are constructed as paradoxical bodies, which are both dangerous to Quebec’s gender norms and endangered by their patriarchal religion. Using material feminist and post-colonial approaches, speaker three discusses the regulation of Muslim women’s bodies as a means to control the deliberately constructed cultural crisis.

Moderator:
Natalie Turrin, Emory University

047. Creative Communities: Blogs, Zines and Online Fan Fiction
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
A Pile of Hope: Zine-Making as Pedagogy in the Women's Studies Classroom
Elizabeth Groeneveld, University of Guelph
This paper analyzes zine crafting as activism and pedagogy, against the backdrop of institutional threats to Women's/Gender Studies programs. It argues that collaborative crafting offers opportunities for building trust and hope in spaces that are often increasingly hostile towards feminism, Zine-making enacts what Alison Piepmeier calls “pedagogies of hope” in ways that challenge conventional and reductive understandings of what constitutes political engagement. Through an account of a collaborative zine-making project within a Women's Studies class, this paper theorizes the place of feminist dreams and the ways in which we might build accountable spaces within the neoliberal corporate university.

Investigating Cultural Producer and Audience Dualisms in Gendered Avatar Play: An Analysis of The Sims 3
Erika M. Behrmann, Eastern Michigan University
This presentation investigates how life simulation games, specifically the bestseller, The Sims 3, aid in gender deconstruction. The Sims 3 allows its player audience the capability to attribute the same traits to male or female avatars. In doing so, players are permitted to experiment with taboo trait attributions and potentially defy a male-female binary. The conceptual framework Kessler and McKenna's (1978) gender trait attribution coupled with Haraway’s (1991) notion of gender deconstruction via cyborgs allows for a discussion on whether The Sims 3 permits players to deconstruct the gender binary.

Virtual Feminisms: Girls' Blogging Communities as Feminist Counterpublics
Jessalynn Marie Keller, University of Texas, Austin
This paper analyzes two contemporary blogs written by teenage girls - The Fbomb (http://thefbomb.org), which founder 17-year-old Julie Zeilinger describes as a “community created for teenage girls who care about their rights as women and want to be heard” and The Seventeen Magazine Project (http://www.theseventeenmagazineproject.com), a media criticism blog written by 18-year-old Jamie Keiles. Through interviews with Zeilinger and Keiles, as well as two Fbomb contributors, I investigate how teenage girls are using online spaces to creatively reclaim feminisms in distinctively “third wave" terms, reframe feminist activism, and reflect their experiences and concerns as political agents and citizens.

Writing Ourselves Out of the Margins: Women of Color and the Subversive Use of Racebending in Fandom
Kristen Jamaya Warner, University of Alabama
The stereotype of women in fandom as well as the genres that most frequently cultivate fans generally precludes women of color. Yet, online communities are emerging that attempt to re-inscribe women of color into central roles where before they were invisible or absent. Through a practice called "racebending," fanfiction writers change the race of central characters. For example, one story transformed Pride and Prejudice's Elizabeth Bennett into a black woman. The goals of these subversive acts are identification and representation. Thus, I aim to highlight some of these online communities and examine how these women self-fashion themselves into stories.

048. A New Visibility: European Perspectives
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Scheduled Life of Grandma
Monika Wilkońska, Sächsische Akademie der Künste, Dresden
The aim of this paper is to critically examine the intersection of old age and womanhood in the popular culture. This study is based on the discursive analysis of weekly opinion news magazines in Poland. It focuses on the attitudes evoked towards a category of old women in the media. The study is grounded in the concept of life schedules that portrays cultural expectations towards various groups of people and their lifestyles. The results of the study indicate a complicated process of (re)creating stereotypical images of old women that takes the position of grandmother as a norm.

Fall and Rise of Czech Feminism
Simona Fojtova, Transylvania University
The 1990s were characterized by difficult dialogues between Western and Eastern European women about resistance to feminism and the relevance of gender as a category of analysis. Yet, despite "backlash before feminism," the Czech society has witnessed a rapid institutionalization of feminism in the new millennium; gender studies programs have become established; feminist scholarship has proliferated; and new explicitly feminist magazines have appeared. This paper will examine how, since the fall of communism, Czech feminists have deployed feminism in a cultural environment where the mainstream media and some prominent émigré intellectuals have denounced feminism as an unnecessary foreign import.

049. Engaging Empire, Imagining Resistance: The Sexual Politics of Islamophobia
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
"The Sword and the Sheath": The Rise of Desert Romances
Amira J. Jarmakani, Georgia State University

If romance novels have long been the subject of vibrant feminist inquiry (Radway, 1991; Modelski, 2007; Goade, 2007), the increased popularity of the sheikh hero in mass market romances since 2001 suggests their continuing relevance to feminist discussions of militarism and empire. While the character of the sheikh is certainly not new in U.S. popular culture, its resurgence as a desirable figure is particularly interesting in the context of U.S.-led war on terror. Using data collected from semi-structured interviews with romance readers, I explore the ways that anxieties about the war on terror are sublimated in desert romances.

"Is there a Queer Democracy, Or - Stop Looking Straight?" Benazir Bhutto and the Hetero-Erotics of Democracy"
Moon Charania, Georgia State University
This paper examines the representational imagery and narrative that positioned Benazir Bhutto as both symbol and spectacle of democracy. In the midst of madly wrought representations of Pakistan as the "most dangerous place on earth," the figure of Benazir Bhutto emerged as both a stable emblem of emancipated modernity and a visual opportunity to narrate empire through a multicultural heteronormative democracy. I argue that this fantasy of democratization relies on a particular kind of racialization and heteronormativity that allowed Bhutto to prevail as democratic celebrity. I ask, through Bhutto, who / what advanced? Who / what was deferred, displaced, defeated?

Neoliberal U.S. Constructions of Female Desire in Iran
Tahereh Aghdasifar, Georgia State University
Through Jasbir Puar's formulation of "queer exceptionalism," I demonstrate how constructions of "LGBT" Iranians are necessary for U.S. neoliberal understandings of self that frame the U.S. as tolerant and progressive vis-à-vis barbaric/sexually repressed Iran. Incitement to this and "Green Movement" discourses demands recognition of the self as a liberal subject desiring of civil rights, regardless of sexual "identity." Through Puar, Massaad's Desiring Arabs, and Najmabadi's work on homosociality, I demonstrate how both discourses diminish different forms of female desire and demand an Iranian understanding of the self that assimilates into the neoliberal multicultural fabric of the U.S.

Dismantling Empire: Arab Women in the 2011 People's Revolution
Basuli Deb, University of Nebraska, Lincoln
Empires have historically hijacked women's rights to justify their direct or indirect presence in other territories. Engaging with such imperial hijacking this paper reflects on figures of women in the 2011 people's uprising against dictatorships and dynastic rule across Arab North Africa and the Middle East, held in place by a Euro-American transnational white empire. Such figures of resistance go a long way in dismantling the imperial mechanisms of using native women to divide and conquer the population of a region. Of special interest to this paper is the alertness to transnational feminism in capturing and circulating such images to tear down imperialism's cherished strategies.

058. Morning Movement: Breath; Root; Hands & Feet; Sphere; Voice; Relational Contact; Playing, Walking & Talking
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 2: Augusta
Wake up with a gentle morning workout. All bodily formations welcome! Participants invited to move in their own bodies' way through a series of movement exercises created to stimulate circulation, release tension, and foster community. This workshop will feature exercises developed through my bodily conversation between feminist theory and a variety of movement arts. Movement-data derived from my participant-observation ethnography of women-led aikido dojos is combined with theory-moves inspired by auditory study of zen, tai chi, nia, opera, contact improvisation, feminist theory, and my body. Join and exit the workshop as desired. Please bring water, wear comfortable clothes, and enjoy!
Presenter: Kristy Lee Garone, Bowling Green State University

059. Tenure, Transformation and Institutionalization: Women’s and Gender Studies and the Ivory Tower
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 10
What does it mean to be a tenured professor in Women’s and Gender Studies? The institutionalization of Women’s and Gender studies has been a long and sometimes turbulent process. Barbara Boxer’s germinal text “Women Ask the Questions” tackled some of the unique pedagogy and curricula questions that women’s and gender studies negotiated. For nearly forty years Women’s and Gender Studies, in various incarnations has been a part of the “Academy.” This roundtable panel seeks to provoke and engage a discussion on the ways in which women’s and gender studies professors are transforming the academy.
Presenters: Zakiya R Adair, University of Missouri, Columbia
Tara Lindsey, University of Missouri, Columbia
Rebecca G. Martinez, University of Missouri, Columbia
Moderator: Rebecca Dingo, University of Missouri, Columbia

Is This the Fiction that Fat Girls Need? Teaching Hairspray and She’s Come Undone in the Women’s Studies & English Classroom
Rachel Dean-Ruzicka, Bowling Green State University
In the spring of 2011 I taught an upper-division course titled “Diversity and Difference in Girls’ Studies.” I wanted to include fatness as one of our intersectional categories of analysis, and I chose to teach Hairspray (Waters 1988) and She’s Come Undone (Lamb 1992) for their popularity and because I wanted to trouble the notion of how fatness is represented in (very) popular culture. The overriding question for the unit came from Susan Stinson: “Is this the fiction that fat girls need?” In my presentation I discuss the conclusions we came to about the narratives of Hairspray and She’s Come Undone, how teaching these texts helped students expand their analyses of discrimination, and what representational strategies might work better as creative interventions to combat sizeism.

Fat Pedagogies of Discomfort: Using Productive Discomfort in the Classroom
Michaela A. Null, Purdue University
Discomfort often has the effect of shutting people down, both mentally and physically, serving as a barrier to dialogue. However, discomfort can also be productive, particularly in a course focused on critical thinking, reflection, and dialogue. Using scholarship which focuses on productive discomfort, I examine the usefulness of making my students uncomfortable when I teach about fatness. Since fatness is a topic which inevitably makes most people uncomfortable, my strategy has been to use that discomfort to my advantage. In what way can students’ discomfort about fatness and fat bodies be rendered productive?
Moderator: Kimberly Dark, California State University San Marcos

057. What would you do 4 Love?
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 13

058. Child Care Friday
8:00 to 7:00 pm • Level 1: Georgia 14

059. Borderlands Testimonianza: Considering the Work/Legacy of Gloria Anzaldua and Maria Luisa Arroyo
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 2
PARTICIPANTS:
Approaching Borderlands through a Critical Dialogue with Blood Memory: Creative and Theoretical Interventions
Hannah Noel, University of Michigan
A mestiza “insider/outsider” theoretical approach is useful when discussing cultural productions of borderlands. It is particularly useful in discussing Forgetting the Alamo, or Blood Memory by Emma Pérez. Blood Memory... tells the story of a cross-dressing lesbian protagonist named Micaela Campos who wonders around what today is the Texas/Mexico border zone where she witnesses violence against Mexicans, African Americans, and indigenous people. Pérez’s historical intervention into queer Tejana history and her critiques of national memory, embodied in the re-rememberance of the Mexican American War from the point of view of a Tejana are re/evolutionary.

Illustrated Borderlands: Reading Chicana Feminisms in Barrio Hoppers
Alexandra Mendoza Covarrubias, University of Minnesota, Twin Cities
Anzaldúa describes the relationship between art and life writing "my people, the Indians, did not split the artistic from the functional, the sacred from the secular, art from everyday life." It is precisely this marriage between art and everyday life that defines Jaime Hernandez’s work in the Love and Rockets series. Drawing from Anzaldúa’s essays, "Tlilli, Tlapalli: The Path of Red and Black Ink" and "Border Arte: Nepantla, el Lugar de la Frontera," this paper proposes that Hernandez’s characters and stories can be read as the enacted embodiments of Anzaldúa’s dialectics.

Violent Effects: Puertorriqueñas, Domestic Violence, and the Artistry of Resistance
Roberta Hurtado, University of Texas, San Antonio
Maria Luisa Arroyo’s Gathering Words deploys testimonioand poetry to identify violence perpetuated against Puertorriqueñas and other women of color while also formulating new ways of constructing identity. I will analyze how Arroyo creates images of real, live humans in these poems, rather than stereotypes and nameless-victims. I analyze Maria Luisa Arroyo’s “invisible women at the shelter,” “days of dirt,” and “gathering words” as testimonios and argue for an understanding of how race, gender, class, and location enable violence against women of color, and the need to create dialogues across the barriers they impose for purposes of survival and resistance.

PARTICIPANTS:
Re-Presenting Lives and Representational Limitations
Pankhuree Dube, Emory University
In this paper, I examine my own interviews with an indigenous woman artist from India, Nankusiya Shyam, and ask what are the ethical and political implications of doing feminist ethnography within a postmodern framework? Kamala Visweswaran’s feminist ethnographer as “trickster” who knows she cannot master the dialogical hope of speaking with a colonized hope of speaking is useful, juggling the “trickster’s” desire to know and the limits of representation, I search for spaces within feminist ethnography from which a politics of possibility might be articulated.

An Encounter on New Ground: Returning Home to Consider the Middle-Class Self Hemangini Gupta, Emory University
Feminism’s political project of situated knowledges that cannot be appropriated is challenged by anthropological work premised on the possibility of representing the ‘Other’. However, recent feminist work by “native” and “halfie” feminist anthropologists (Lila Abu-Lughod, Kirin Narayan) whose ethnographic encounters take place at ‘home’, to hold the configurations between Self and Other, and Western and Native. This paper examines the possibility of new feminist ethnographies when the traditional boundaries are further fragmented by the ethnographer’s own return ‘home’ to study the native, but the middle-class citizen, and engages in the activism that forms the ‘object’ of her ethnography in Bangalore, India.

Dismantling the “Master’s Tools” of Business: Feminist Methods in Social Enterprise
Hilary King, Emory University
Social enterprise aims to re-conceive business interactions to incorporate human and environmental values thereby subverting rational business strategies. Feminist understandings of power, emotional life, and values are crucial for expanding and changing business structures in this new model. Feminist ethnography and queer theory can be used to re-shape relationships between participants in social enterprise endeavors, thereby altering historic patterns of domination within business. Drawing on research with a direct trade coffee company and farmers in the Dominican Republic, this paper examines ways that feminist frameworks can be applied to social enterprise in order to ‘dismantle the master’s house’ of business.

8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 4

PARTICIPANTS:
Men: Partners in Feminism?
Michael Steklof, State University of New York, Albany
This paper will explore the relationship between men and feminism. Assuming that most men believe that women should not be raped and discriminated against due to their gender, why are they not more visibly involved in feminist movements? This paper will explore the historical relationship between men and feminism, suggest why feminism benefits men, and investigate how feminist men can further the political agenda of feminism. I will specifically look at the work of self-identified male feminists and consider how they have entered into conversations that address sexism and male privilege.

Don’t Call Me Feminist!: Korean Housewives’ Leadership in Consumer Cooperative Activism
Soojin Kim, State University of New York, Albany
This paper will examine the political and socio-cultural implications of housewives’ engagement in consumers’ cooperatives movement in Korea. In contemporary societies, food has come to be an arena where a variety of political economic, socio-cultural, and globalized issues are complicatedly intertwined. Under these circumstances, especially in Korean case, consumers’ cooperatives of food products have provided housewives with an opportunity to participate in larger social issues. This paper will analyze how these women and other social groups have evaluated their social activities in the perspectives of feminism.

662. Neoliberal Assault on Reproductive Rights and Health: Transnational Perspectives from Turkey, France and the United States
8:00 to 9:15 am - Level 1: Georgia 5 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Crisis and Pernicious Consequences for Reproductive Health in France?
Brigitte Marti, Center for Transnational Women's Issues

Although France stands out for its integrative and comprehensive reproductive policies and its public health care system, the current surge of social austerity plans following neoliberal ideologies led to a restructuring of the delivery system that will affect women especially the most vulnerable despite recommendations of its own administration, feminist activists and providers. Using narratives of women, providers, French Movement for the Family planning counselors, including narratives of resistance, the presenter will examine the interactions between the political climate and reproductive health in transnational and intersectional perspectives in France, in comparison with the United States' and Turkey's health reforms.

Crisis and Down Regulations of Women's Rights in the United States
Carol Ritter, Conversation Coalition Maryland

The speaker addresses the root causes of dehumanization within the context of the current organized crisis of access to reproductive health in the United States. Using her experience as a gynecologist, working in underserved communities in and outside of the U.S., she will expose the pernicious effects of the absence of awareness and the complacency of the physicians especially those working with women. She will use a historical transnational feminist approach to interpret her observations and field notes on the interactions between all the actors of the medical industrial complex, i.e., pharmaceutical companies, health insurances and the medical profession.

663. Feminist Refashionings: Embodying Activism through Photographs, Oral History, and Directing the Stage

Xin Huang, University of British Columbia

This paper discusses the methodological issues of a research project that copies women's personal photos to examine the bodily project of "taming" the masculine women and changing performances of femininity in China.

Inspired by feminist participatory research methods, this project is designed to encourage women's agency and facilitate self-representation by inviting the participant to re-organize their photos into an album as "photo-autobiography" — a life story told largely through images. Based on the author's five-month fieldwork experience, this paper discusses the ethical and methodological issues raised during the research process, as well as the lessons and promising practices.

656 Years of Whiteness: Using Oral History to Voice My Family's Multiracial Heritage
Jessie Turner, University of California, Santa Barbara

Oral history has a strong anti-racist and feminist social justice tradition as a tool to document, correct, and uncover accessible histories by and about a variety of structurally oppressed communities. Within the context of Multiracial Studies theorization of racial and ethnic identity migrations, this paper traces the ways in which the oral history process facilitates the creation of new racial knowledge and memory in my "white" Vermont family, which in turn generates the possibility for an alternate feminist and anti-racist familial racial narrative and identity.

Aesthetic Activism: The Transformative Potential of Feminist Directing Kellyn Johnson, University of California, Santa Barbara

Feminist directors utilize alternative aesthetics to challenge hegemonic narratives. Their practice questions political structures through the construction of an ephemeral "imagined space" with transformative potential. While much attention has been paid to the possibility of a feminist aesthetic in playwriting, relatively little work has been done on the embodied aesthetic created by feminist directors. This paper posits the potential activist efficacy of such directing strategies through their aesthetic impact on audiences. Examining commercial productions, this paper specifically explores the possibility of a feminist aesthetic within "mainstream" theatre, challenging both the politics of traditional theatre and assumed marginality of "feminist" theatre.

PARTICIPANTS:
"Don't Agonize, Organize": The Displaced Homemakers Movement and the Politicization of Housework in the 1970s
Lisa Levenstein, University of North Carolina, Greensboro

This paper explores the 1970s feminist campaign on behalf of displaced homemakers — middle-aged housewives who experienced downward mobility after being divorced or widowed. This movement challenges stereotypes of 1970s feminists as uninterested in the plight of homemakers and helps us to understand how feminists and conservatives recontextualized homemaking at a time when increasing numbers of mothers entered the labor force. In championing the interests of white middle-class mothers, the displaced homemakers movement contributed to the stigmatization of welfare recipients by emphasizing the way that former homemakers' experiences and struggles differed from those of poor mothers who received public assistance.

Sandeep Has Four Mommies: Social Constructions of Gender and Family In Nepali Orphanages
Jennifer Rothchild, University of Minnesota, Morris

This paper discusses the methodological issues of a research project that copies women's personal photos to examine the bodily project of "taming" the masculine women and changing performances of femininity in China.

Inspired by feminist participatory research methods, this project is designed to encourage women's agency and facilitate self-representation by inviting the participant to re-organize their photos into an album as "photo-autobiography" — a life story told largely through images. Based on the author's five-month fieldwork experience, this paper discusses the ethical and methodological issues raised during the research process, as well as the lessons and promising practices.
This paper identifies gender as a socially-constructed process that legitimizes gender inequalities or produces gender forms that challenge prevailing attitudes about women and girls. Based on ethnographies of orphanages in Nepal, we focus on traditionally conceptualized ideas of gender and family (specifically, "womanhood" and "motherhood") as resisted, renegotiated, and reconstructed. Orphanages—as "extra-social" spaces—offer a changing set of possibilities for gender roles and a resistance to the status quo. Findings from this study not only inform our understanding of gender but also provide innovative models of egalitarian gender practices and opportunities for promoting gender equity in a variety of settings.

The Museum of Motherhood

Lynn Kuechle, Motherhood Foundation/The Museum of Motherhood

The Museum of Motherhood is the first and only facility of its kind serving as a unique resource for those who wish to study the history of mothers, mother-art and the culture of family. The Museum's purpose is to provide a space and platform that raises awareness of mother-work and amplifies the voices of women and families. Its purpose is to encourage individuals to evaluate their own experiences as mothers in authentic and mindful ways.

065. Moving Beyond the Walls of Women's Studies with Service Learning

8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 8

This roundtable session is designed to explore service learning, including how it is defined, the terminology used and whether it is problematic, teachers' and students' experiences with service learning, challenges to service learning, innovative ways to employ service learning, and gauging the community impact of service learning. While all panel participants have experiences with service learning to share, this roundtable will also call on the audience to share their experiences and thoughts.

066. Women Environmental Artists' Connections to Feminism, Nature, and Art

8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 1: Georgia 9

Are women environmental artists creating art with a feminist agenda? Is Mother Nature their muse? As discussed in this workshop, feminist research has allowed women environmental artists to share their work through personal interviews and images. We will discuss these artists' particular works and will further explore connections between feminism, nature, and art. In doing so, we will consider women environmental artists' contemporary challenges and interests, including their desire to increase awareness of the environment.

068. Epistemology, Courage and Women's Participation in Academia

8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 2: Savannah 1

PARTICIPANTS:

Social Positioning and Courage as a Political Virtue

Maria Renee Rosales, Guilford College

The idea of courage as a political virtue is ancient. Plato argues that one form of courage is telling the truth in politics even when that truth is unpopular. Similarly, Hannah Arendt suggests that "courage, which we now feel to be an indispensable quality of the hero, is in fact already present in a willingness to act and speak at all, to insert one's self into the world and begin a story of one's own." Using Hannah Arendt and bell hooks, this paper interrogates the racialized and gendered ways that courage has been constructed in the politics of academia.

Contextualizing Courage in Academia

Naadiya Hasan, Guilford College

As Patricia Hill Collins notes, academics that operate from the standpoint of the outsider are often evaluated according to epistemological standards that devalue and contradict their experiential knowledge. For women of color, demonstrating a willingness to act and speak can also become the justification for exclusion and suppression of critique of the institution. Do constructions of courage reinforce an ideal of social participation that makes privilege conferred by position in intersecting systems of inequality? Can silence and inaction be perceived as courageous and integral to resistance of efforts for academics that are more vulnerable to exclusion and intimidation?

White Women as Allies in Academia

Lisa Jo McLeod, Guilford College

Gatekeepers in academia have not been held accountable for understanding the workings of systemic oppressions, and the dominant narrative of "excellence" for academics is, in every domain, raced and gendered in a way that remains unspoken in tenure and promotion reviews. In this paper, I argue that, given these conditions, white women allies will benefit themselves and their institutions by learning to be effective allies to their women of color colleagues. Whether such behavior counts as a duty or a kind of surreptitious privilege conferred by position in intersecting systems of inequality? Can silence and inaction be perceived as courageous and integral to resistance of efforts for academics that are more vulnerable to exclusion and intimidation?
The first decade of the twenty-first century has seen a resurgence of pornography, stripping, and prostitution, with a mainstream acceptance of these as "empowerment" and "choice" for young women. My paper critiques third wave "sex-positive" feminism in Britain and the United States, analyzing the terms and concepts of Natasha Walker's and Ariel Levy's recent books. The purpose of the paper is to explore not only similarities but different nuances in both countries' return to sexism in the 2000s, in order to show how the socioeconomic structure of each country affects its cultural production around patriarchy and sex roles.

Sexting as Feminist Media Production? Gender, Sexuality, and Discourses about Technology

Amy Adele Hasinoff, McGill University

While girls' media production practices garner attention and praise from feminist academics, many scholars and cultural commentators worry that teenage girls who create their own sexually explicit media are pressured by peers or suffering from low self-esteem. How do discussions about sexting complicate both popular narratives about youth and technology and the growing academic attention and valorization of girls' nonsexual digital media production?

"Feminism"-ing Queer Theory: On the Body, Women, and Rights

Rebecca Lynne Harris, Texas A&M University

"Queering feminism" and "queer feminism" have been extremely useful strategies for pointing to the ways in which feminist theory needed to account for power relations that were not strictly heterosexual. However, this paper makes an intervention into those two theoretical models, "feminist" and "queer," and deploys feminism as the verb. This paper seeks to "feminism" queer in a way that re-examines what has become a well-rehearsed dismissal of rights discourse from within queer frameworks through what I argue is a feminization of the concept of "rights" as they are associated with the body, the home, and privacy.

"Relating Queer: This Bridge Called Our Bodies"

Thelathia Young, Bucknell University; Robyn E. Henderson-Espinoza, University of Denver

Bodies are borderland spaces acting as modes of knowing and knowledge production, means for relating, and sites for moral reflection and action. Queer bodies not only possess potential for moral agency, they perform a morality which destabilizes the notion of identity categories by signaling two important images: the borderlands, a complex and contested site for bodies to orient themselves; and bridges, transformative pathways highlighting the intersecting realities of borderlands. Queering our orientation to bodies permits us to access different points of departures from which we understand morality in our society and interrogate the kind of relating that bridges make possible.

NWSA 2011 ANNUAL CONFERENCE
Wellness and Healing organizing offers scholars and organizers an opportunity to rethink how organizing can be done in urban, people of color-majority communities. It is my contention that wellness organizing has historical influences of women-based and black feminist organizing.

Nurses’ Perceptions of and Attitudes Toward Transgender Patients

Erin Lynn Hill, University of Colorado, Denver

Nurses have the potential to provide life-saving interventions to diverse patients with a wide range of gender identities. However, when a nurse’s judgment is clouded by negative perceptions of their patients, their ability to treat within ethical bounds may be hindered. This study (in progress) hopes to examine how nurses perceive transgender patients and how their perceptions might impact direct patient care. Qualitative and quantitative data will be obtained through a survey administered to staff nurses at a safety-net hospital in a major metropolitan area. Findings will be used to provide recommendations for future studies and implications for nursing education.

Social Contexts and HIV Risk among Low-Income Cocaine, Crack, and Heroin-Using WSW of Color

Sel J Hwang, Columbia University

Low-income/poverty-class cocaine-, crack-, and heroin-using WSW of color (women of color who have sex with women) prefer women as their relational and sexual partners, often trade sex with men out of economic necessity. Low-income drug-using WSW are a high-risk HIV population, with HIV seroprevalence ranging from 12.8% to 53%. In randomly selected samples of high HIV risk drug-using women, drug-using WSW comprise a sizable portion, and sometimes even a majority of drug-using women. Studies indicate that drug-using WSW are at higher HIV risk from both distal and proximal factors compared to drug-using women who have sex with men only.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV

Sexualization Protest: Action, Resistance, Knowledge (SPARK) is a growing intergenerational feminist movement for girls’ and women’s rights to healthy sexuality. SPARK partners work in coalition to challenge the sexualization of girls by generating alternative forms of media and coordinating actions on the ground and online. Each of three different girl-serving SPARK partner organizations—Project Girl, viBe Theater Experience, and Hardy Girls Healthy Women/Powered By Girl—will briefly present a hands-on, interactive “SPARKit” activity. Presentations are designed to open up discussion about sexual expression, media sexualization, and ways to engage girls in creative forceful reactions.

Mixing in the Kitchen: Transnational Musical Compositions
Martha Gonzalez, University of Washington

Low-cost portable recording equipment such as Digi-O1 Pro-tools facilitates transnational musical dialogues between U.S. based Chicana and Jarocho musicians in Vera Cruz, Mexico. Previously, only “professionals” had access to cost-prohibitive recording equipment. Chicana and Jarocho musician mothers usually consumed by familial responsibilities record and compose around domestic duties and locations. Mixing and music editing the kitchen and living room space redefines patriarchal and male normative ideas of the recording process. Ultimately, portable recording technologies as they are utilized by women across borders, compel us to ask what pedagogical shifts occur when one re-contextualizes the “sound booth” within kitchens.

Telling Stories with Youth: Creating Visual Dialogues on Queer Identities and Communities

Calla E. Chancellor, University of Washington

In popular culture and academic scholarship, discussions about GLBT/Queer youth are profoundly shaped around technologies of visibility. This paper offers a critical perspective on queer youth and their relationship to visibility (ways of seeing/bing seen) based on a unique case study with a group of GLBTQ youth in Seattle using photovoice, a participatory research method. In this project, we used Holga cameras (a low-tech film camera) to explore the uses of photography as a means to engage in critical thinking and dialogues with peers and strangers through a six-month project culminating in a collaboratively produced public art exhibit and website.

Intertextual Interventions in the Archive of Rock

Nicole Leigh Robert, University of Washington

This paper is grounded in a digital media project that is built upon personal narratives contributed by women excluded from the hegemonic historical narrative of rock. Using free tools, this project connects their stories to physical locations, takes their histories outside the walls of institutions, and uses metadata tags to explore the intersectional possibilities of online linking. Based on the historical interventions of Black and Chicana feminists, I consider the theoretical and practical implications of using these tools to intervene in hegemonic constructs of what counts as knowledge, as history and as archive.

Housewives, Divorcees, and Professionals: Zora Neale Hurston, Feminist Ethnography, and Black Male/Female Relationships

Riche Barnes, Smith College

While Zora Neale Hurston’s work and life were revived in 1975 through Alice Walker’s Ms. Magazine article “In Search of Zora Neale Hurston”, scholars have just recently begun to not only discover her contributions to the discipline of anthropology but to recognize the fact that much of Hurston’s literary scholarship was developed through her ethnographic field-work in her native Eatonville, FL, New Orleans, and the Caribbean. In this paper, I suggest that much of Hurston’s ethnographic focus was on understanding and theorizing black male/female relationships. I also suggest that her treatment of marriage, work and family in the black community and particularly the gender roles and strategies of black women, merges with contemporary... have thrived in enrollment, adding upper-level courses to their course offerings and maintaining high enrollment. What does it mean for a community college student, potentially interested in transferring to a four-year setting, to become active in the Women's Students' Association or to consider Women's Studies as a major? What inherent challenges do administrators face in maintaining a strong, highly visible program for students at an entirely commuter campus? This roundtable, innovatively composed of community college faculty, administrators, and students, will examine both the advantages and setbacks of effectively providing an enriching academic experience at the two-year college level. Topics will range from advocating for funding to administration to teaching faculty's challenges in maintaining continuity between lower- and upper-level women's studies classes. Faculty will incorporate an analysis of students' academic preparedness in a suburban setting in which students have not often been conditioned to analyze women's studies topics within a global context. Students will elaborate on the opportunities and resources available for activism within the community as well as attempts to bring major productions to campus, such as The Vagina Monologues.

Teaching Upper-Level Women's Studies Courses at a Community College Level
Pramila Venkateswaran, Nassau Community College
Incorporating the paradigm of Jacqui Alexander and Chanda Talpade Mohanty in "Cartographies of Knowledge and Power: Transnational Feminism as Radical Praxis," I analyze the challenges inherent in constructing syllabi and curricula for upper-level women's studies courses for community college students, many of whom have not been conditioned to examine women's issues outside of their immediate environment.

Participants:
Negotiating Memory and Violence in Lucille Clifton's Poetry: Creative Intervention for Racial Equality
Anne Marie Rashid, Carlow University
In many of Lucille Clifton’s poems, her speaker appeals to the natural world to either make sense of senseless violence, or to find empathy, since the speaker cannot find it in the human world. As she explores this volatile territory of the past and present, her poems create a space for solace, but also rupture. In her life affirming style, she not only memorializes those who have been wrongfully killed throughout history, she creates a tone of intolerance for any more violence, and empowers her reader to seek the same justice.

Negotiating Language and Violation in Arielle Greenberg’s Poetry: Creative Intervention for an Empowered Sexuality

Darcy Lee Brandel, Marygrove College

Greenberg’s poetry provides a unique sense of the complexities of women’s sexuality in the 21st century. Danger looms largely in her shifting language, where metaphors refuse easy assimilation and perspectives slip between our fingers. This linguistic instability helps us consider the blurry real-life boundaries between women’s safety and violation, between our sexual power and vulnerability. Like an intuitive sense of danger many women learn to trust as we negotiate the world, Greenberg’s poems teach us that abstract feelings require our recognition. The creative intervention of her poetry teaches readers strategies for trusting themselves and recognizing the complexity of female sexuality.

Negotiating Poverty and Religion in Taslima Nasrin’s Poetry: Creative Intervention for Gender Equality

Sigrid King, Carlow University

Taslima Nasrin’s poetry emerged from her experiences as a physician in Bangladesh’s health clinics where she worked with women who were victims of domestic violence or extreme poverty. Her concerns were often framed within criticism of Islamic fundamentalist teachings that reinforce patriarchal cultural practices detrimental to women’s health, education, and general well being. Because of her frank observations, she became the target of a campaign to ban her work and to silence her voice. Nasrin’s poems depict the complex relationship between poverty, fundamentalism, and gender inequality, and they demonstrate Nasrin’s commitment to help bring about gender equality in Bangladesh.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 11

As a feature of our academic curriculum, women faculty face choices about ways to contribute simultaneously as teachers, scholars, and activists. The intersections of race, gender, and sexual identity within the academy force us to consider the complexities of the pedagogical, theoretical, and agental work that we perform in academic space. This roundtable is designed to promote discussion between both junior and senior Black women faculty about how our race, gender, and sexual identities impact our roles as feminist teachers, scholars, mentors, and activists within the academy.

"It’s Not a March on Washington": Deploying Feminism from within the Academy
Amy Johnson Howton, University of Cincinnati

WGSS faculty and WC staff from one institution participated in an action research project that considered ways in which we—both individually and organizationally—strategically deploy feminisms to create institutional change. Ultimately, the action research project aimed to: 1) deepen our understanding of the complex ways in which institutional change occurs in our institution; 2) build coalitions among and between us; and 3) inform ongoing attempts to make meaning of our organizations’ work and institutional impact. This paper outlines three emergent themes from the data and reflects on the action research process itself.

Changing Face of the University: How Pre-college Programs Are Shaping University, Women’s Studies and Agency
Nicole Murphy, Beloit College

In this presentation I will focus on how the success of pre-college programs specifically those serving underrepresented student populations, are shaping our understandings of the university, women’s studies, agency and identity. In the last two decades universities have experienced a demographic shift in their consumer, the student. Increasing enrollment from underrepresented groups like first generation, low income and minority students have forced conversations of diversity, privilege in scholarship and agency through education.

Re-visioning Academia - A Diversity of Libratory Pedagogy Designed by Women of Color
Arisika Razak, California Institute of Integral Studies

This paper explores the various approaches that feminist scholars from diverse socio-cultural locations within the USA (e.g. Collins, Grande, 2008; hooks, 1994, 2003; Kwok, 1995; Lee 2007; Miranda, 2002; Morales, 1998; Smith 2010; Westfield 2008; etc.) are utilizing in their attempts to construct a critical and liberatory pedagogy that speaks to the needs and demands of diverse populations of color — and to the difficulties that radical women of color still have in the academy when their academic work supports their communities’ survival.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 13

The mission statement for our collective blog reads as follows: to "bridge feminist research and popular reality" and "[to] publicly and passionately dispel modern myths concerning gender, encouraging other feminist scholars, writers, and thinkers to do the same." Our blog includes ten academic women who use the blog format to bring topics within their scholarly work to a wider audience and to reflexively bring topics explored online back to their classrooms and future projects. Contributors will speak about how blogging for a larger audience impacts their research, writing, and teaching and how collaborative blogging can serve broader feminist goals.

083. Decolonizing Methodologies: How Women of Color Studies Transforms Women's Studies

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 2

In this roundtable, women’s studies faculty members will discuss the practice and promise of intersectionality in women of color studies. We are interested in the ways in which theories and methods of ethnic studies and queer studies shape, inform, and transform modes of inquiry in women’s studies, and we will discuss concrete practices of intersectionality in our teaching and scholarship. Examining the ideas and methodologies generated by intersectionality, we also interrogate its limits and ask what possibilities it may obscure or preclude. Does the use of intersectionality as a methodology necessarily subvert the ‘master’s tools’?

From Pathology to Strengths: Transforming Perceptions of Latina Women in the Mental Health System
Jill E. Murray, Southern University, New Orleans

Traditional pathological views of Latina women in the mental health system are challenged using a feminist analysis to examine mental health providers’ perceptions of Latina women. This study finds a point of collaboration between feminisms and studies on resilience in mental health and seeks to understand how mental health providers perceive or understand Latina women as clients. Interviews of mental health providers are analyzed using standpoint theory as a theoretical framework with a phenomenological analysis. The study concludes that resilience and strength-based perspectives can transform the treatment of Latina women in the mental health system.

Reading Women’s Cyber Health Dialogue as a Meso-level Mechanism of Power in Foucauldian Feminism
Chikako Takeshita, University of California, Riverside

This paper evaluates the utility of Michel Foucault’s notion of governmentalities, which captures the contact between macro- and micro-levels of power, for feminist scholarship through a reading of women’s online postings around distressing contraceptive side effects. Upon encountering others with similar symptoms, women regain an embodied sense of self and pursue wellness. A new concept, mechanism of power at the meso-level, is introduced to facilitate the understanding of women’s cyber-health dialogues as a site that channels macro-strategies of power that promote healthism in a neoliberal society into micro-workings of power that motivates individual women to practice technologies of the self.

“Sick and Tired of Feeling Sick and Tired”: The Politics of Thyroid Disease
Julie Ann Winterich, Guilford College

Hypothyroidism is a thyroid disease that disproportionately affects women, typically between the ages of 30-50. The most common symptoms include constipation, depression, weight gain, and fatigue. Based on my experiences with hypothyroidism, and open-ended interviews with a diverse group of women, I examine the struggles of finding adequate medical care. This project uses feminist interviewing to allow women to “talk back” (hooks, 1989) to a biomedical system that devalues their illness accounts. I also draw on their narratives to discuss the politics of knowledge creation because no gender or sociological research has been conducted on this topic to date.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 4

This sponsored session by the Feminist Mothering Caucus will examine and evaluate developments in the field of maternal feminist scholarship and address ways to assess and evaluate motherhood studies scholarship within and outside the discipline of women’s studies. Among the questions to be explored are the following: What are some of the perspectives and/or theoretical frameworks that have inspired scholarship within maternal studies? What are the current debates? What is its place within women’s studies? Is a distinct scholarly discipline of motherhood studies needed or necessary? What are its future directions?

Manfood: Masculinity on TV Food Programming
Maria Bevacqua, Minnesota State University, Mankato

While the kitchen and cooking have long been associated with women and femininity, the large number of male chefs in instructional television food programming may lead some to propose that a fundamental shift in gender norms and representations has taken place. This paper presents content analysis of food programming to examine the gendered messages and possibilities depicted. It will question whether the masculinities presented in TV food programming are a departure from, or an inscription of hegemonic masculinities.

“Hegans”: An Examination of the Emerging Male Vegan
Justine Ann Johnson, Minnesota State University, Mankato

Research in critical food studies or masculinity studies assert that men use meat as a tool of power (Adams, Inness, Counihan). I argue that vegan men use the same rhetoric as traditional masculine ideologies even though they have rejected a major connection to power. My paper contributes new knowledge to gender studies and food discourses by examining the connection between masculinity and male vegans. Through content analysis of explicit vegan material Skinny Bastard by Rory Freedman and Kim Barnouin and Meat is for Pussies by John Joseph and men’s magazines I interrogate the prevalence of hegemonic masculinity in popular culture.

The Kitchen and the Classroom: Teaching Feminist Food Studies
Maria Bevacqua, Minnesota State University, Mankato; Justine Ann Johnson, Minnesota State University, Mankato

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level: Georgia 6 - AV
Online education is growing rapidly and Women’s Studies faculty are being compelled to develop and teach more and more courses as online offerings and respond to the needs of the university and students. Online Women’s Studies courses and degree programs provide increased access and flexibility for women who might otherwise not be able to attend college, especially non-traditional female students who work full time, return to school after an absence, have a long commute to campus or childcare responsibilities. The virtual classroom also engages the new generation of students who use technology in every aspect of their lives.

088. From Center to Margin: Women’s Studies? Gender Studies? Sexualities Studies?
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level: Georgia 7

Feminisms now co-exist with gender studies and queer theories. These conceptual changes intersect with the particulars of our programs, students, campuses, and faculty. Decisions are made renaming programs, embracing sexualities studies, redefining curricular emphases, and hiring faculty. What have we gained from this repositioning of central areas of concern? What crucial questions remain unanswered? How have these changes taken place? Do we have a shared understanding of process? How do we want to develop into the future? This workshop offers a structured discussion on how these larger conceptual developments play out on our specific campuses.

089. Race, Gender, and the Politics of Solidarity
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level: Georgia 8

Drawing on our experiences as activist-scholars, our roundtable will explore the following questions: 1) Do the scholarship, curriculum, and pedagogy practiced in Women’s Studies reflect an understanding of feminism as a theory and praxis of solidarity and social justice? 2) Are intersectional analyses and transnational feminist frameworks sufficient to disrupt the “master tools” and to radically transform women, gender, and sexuality studies in the academy? 3) How do we cultivate accountability in our classrooms and institutions to subvert the dominant (liberal) paradigm of inclusion and dialogue across differences?

Silent Goddesses and Sacrificial Mothers: Buchi Emecheta's The Joys of Motherhood
Winter Elliott, Brenau University

This paper assesses the relationship between ideology and speech in Buchi Emecheta’s work, analyzing the ways in which the language of African motherhood both culturally and in Emecheta’s work, has been elevated to a kind of divinity that only serves to silence ordinary women. Significantly, at the end of Emecheta’s The Joys of Motherhood, the main character, Nnu Ego, is elevated to postmortal divinity and prayed to — but she never answers her supplicants. The character’s failure to speak to her audience after her death implies Emecheta’s position on female divinity.

Greatness Makes Tragedy: Achebe and Emecheta on Gendered Heroes
Monique Winb, Brenau University

This paper discusses African cultural boundaries, gender roles, and heroes by contrasting Chinua Achebe’s Things Fall Apart and Buchi Emecheta’s The Joys of Motherhood. The protagonists in these novels, Okonkwo and Nnu Ego, are defined by cultural structures that limit roles for both men and women. Both protagonists function as paradigms within their cultural contexts and within Emecheta’s work, analyzing the ways in which the language of African motherhood both culturally and in Emecheta’s work, has been elevated to a kind of divinity that only serves to silence ordinary women. Significantly, at the end of Emecheta’s The Joys of Motherhood, the main character, Nnu Ego, is elevated to postmortal divinity and prayed to — but she never answers her supplicants. The character’s failure to speak to her audience after her death implies Emecheta’s position on female divinity.

Pink and Blue Heroics in Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie’s Purple Hibiscus and Half a Yellow Sun
Heather Gollmar Casey, Brenau University

This paper considers the intersection of gender relations, neocolonialism, and conceptions of heroism. Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie’s novels, particularly Purple Hibiscus and Half of a Yellow Sun, are excellent sources for examining the impact of neocolonialism through a gendered lens. By telling her stories through the eyes of both male and female protagonists, Jaja and Kambili, and Ugwu and Olanna/Kainene, Adichie is able to show the effects of neocolonialism on gender stereotypes and gender relations. Similarly, an examination of the characters “heroic” actions and perceptions of self reveals gendered conceptions of heroism.

The Politics of Teaching Gender and Islam in the West
Huma Ahmed-Ghosh, San Diego State University

In this paper, I want to deconstruct and engage in a dialogue on why teaching courses on women/gender and Islam are mushrooming in colleges and universities post 9/11. Two main themes that I will delve into are: 1) Why is this topic of particular interest now? and 2) How are such courses positioned in academia in terms of what is being taught, who gets to teach such courses through which programs or departments? Towards that attempt, I will analyze syllabi available online on women/gender and Islam and discuss my own experiences of putting such a course together and of teaching it.

Women's Studies Curriculum Transformation for Feminist Solidarity: Integrating Transnational Perspectives
Jessica Spain Sadr, San Diego State University

Drawing on Chandra Mohanty’s comparative feminist studies curricular model, which is premised on a recognition of the constitutive links between the local and the global foregrounding points of connection and disjunction rather than physical geography or territory, I develop a framework necessary for the examination of transnational perspectives situated within U.S. women’s studies core curricula. Specifically, twenty feminist theory undergraduate course syllabi are analyzed through a feminist solidarity lens revealing the extent to which transnational perspectives are being integrated into women’s studies, and to what degree the core curriculum highlights intersectional analyses based on co-implication, mutuality, and solidarity in globalized society.

Teaching Emerging Feminist Practices in Ethics and Science
Sara Giordano, Emory University

Bioethics has been critiqued by those inside and outside the sciences, for different reasons. Paul Rabinow suggests that we need a new bioethical model that can better address new sciences. I describe a co-taught course designed to have an impact on the emerging field of synthetic biology. The design takes up Rabinow’s call to incorporate ethics from the beginning and collaborate across disciplines, from a feminist perspective. In the class, students from biology, philosophy and women’s studies explored the intersections of synthetic biology, ethics and community-based practices. Through this project, students engaged directly with synthetic biologists and genetic engineers.

092. Ripples in the Water: Black Women’s Ontology as Sustenance and Upliftment
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Savannah 2

This roundtable will identify ontologically strategic characteristics of Black women’s lived experiences that serve to 1) sustain identity, 2) support communal grounding, and 3) enhance continued action for justice and equality. Focusing on cultural expression - dance and the visual arts - lynching and civil rights activism, the roundtable discussants will tease out diverse techniques used by Black women to sustain and enrich daily life.

Narrating Eroticism: Black Female Public Intellectuals Disrupting the Culture of Dissemblance
Brittney Chante' Cooper, University of Alabama
In A Colored Woman in a White World, Mary Church Terrell, an early Black female public intellectual, focuses significant attention on her love of dancing, an activity largely prohibited by Black communities' staunch adherence to the politics of respectability. This discussion of dancing bespeaks a particular strategy through which Black women intellectuals, always aware of the reception of their bodies in public, reclaim a Lordean notion of the erotic through an unapologetic narrative engagement with the corporeal. I argue that Black women's narrative entanglements with the corporeal disrupt prevailing scholarly configurations of the ever-present culture of dissemblance and politics of respectability.

Exploring Muslim Women's Lives Through the Medium of Storytelling
Maha Marouan, University of Alabama
Since the summer of 2009, I have been collecting stories from Moroccan women at home and in the Diaspora. Based on their stories, as well as my own story as a Muslim academic living in the US, this paper engages with female cultural identity beyond a superficial construction of Muslim women as passive and subdued, offering narratives of resistance. These stories also connect Moroccan women to a larger body of work concerned with recording the experiences of third-world women and women of color whose voices have been marginalized within colonial discourses and power relations.

True and Ancient Properties?: Sisterhood and Identity in Toni Morrison's Tar Baby
Susana M. Morris, Auburn University
Toni Morrison's 1981 novel Tar Baby is often read as a celebration of the ancestor figure. While Tar Baby does indeed celebrate the ancestor through the notion of "daughterhood," I would argue that the novel is a cautionary tale about heritage and women's public identity in more ways than one. To that end, this paper contends that not only does the novel indict imperialism and Eurocentrism as detrimental to black women's lives, it also illuminates both the possibilities and the pitfalls of romanticizing heritage through the novel's ongoing tensions between personal autonomy and familial duty for women in particular.

094. African American Women Looking Back: The Use of Storyboards to Facilitate Narrative and Meaning Construction around Disclosure of Childhood Sexual Abuse
9:25 to 10:40 am  •  Level 2: Valdosta

The Story Board Method, born out of the narrative tradition, is participant-driven, and it has been effectively used to assist participants in articulating aspects of their lived experience that are challenging or painful to access. Creating a disclosure Story Board empowers participants to tell their stories in a way that is meaningful to them. Integration with a theoretically grounded interview guide allows the researcher to present key domains for each participant's consideration. This combination enhances trustworthiness of data and builds participants' confidence in the research endeavor.

PARTICIPANTS:
The Global Politics of Local Domestic Worker Organizing
Premilla Nadasen, Queens College, City University of NY
Over the past decade and a half, domestic worker campaigns in the United States have fostered innovative organizing strategies. They have placed race, gender, nation, and culture at the center of labor organizing and challenged assumptions about the labor process and mobilization strategies. This paper will explore the transnational political organizing of the National Domestic Workers Alliance. It will examine how this organization has been able to forge a coalition among Chicano, Filipina, South Asian, Caribbean, Central American, and African American domestic workers. For many of these workers their identification as "workers" is integrated with their transnational connections. My paper will examine how and why domestic workers, despite the atomized nature of their employment and the racial and cultural differences, have been able to mobilize not only locally and nationally, but internationally. It will examine both the character of organizing as well as the neoliberal economic climate that has led to dramatic shifts in women's employment.

"Protection of the kind . . . provided for other workers" while accounting for its "special character": The International Labor Organization [ILO] Considers Domestic Workers
Eileen Boris, University of California, Santa Barbara
This presentation, based on analysis of ILO and related UN records, analyzes earlier efforts at improving the working conditions of household workers—and why they failed. Whereas domestic workers are spearheading today’s fight for labor standards, in the mid-20th century labor feminists took the lead. While ILO experts in 1967 spoke of the "claim on the public conscience," domestic workers themselves in 2010 demanded the same rights as any other laborer, that is, as a Mexican worker delegate explained, "non-discrimination and equal opportunity, meaning a decent wage, decent conditions regarding occupational safety and health, stable employment, non violence and access to social security, so that we have somewhere to live, health care and a decent retirement" but also "recognition of freedom of association and the right to organize." Whereas her claim reinforces the ILO’s agenda of "decent work," a half century ago the claims of domestic workers sat uneasily in the conflict between protective legislation, equality discourses, and the ILO’s focus on the industrial worker.

The International Domestic Workers Network: Women’s Transnational Activism at the Borders of UN Agencies
Jennifer Natalie Fish, Old Dominion University
The 2010 gathering of the International Labour Conference (ILC) in Geneva marked a poignant moment for domestic worker organizations and human rights advocates because it placed “Decent Work for Domestic Workers” at the center of its tripartite dialogue. This presentation will present a summary of two years of fieldwork with the International Domestic Workers Network at the International Labour Conferences in Geneva. The discourse and imagery that emerged surrounding domestic work throughout these proceedings provide data on a wider collective interpretation of the social constructions of gender, nation, and class within this global sector of women’s labour.

Appealing for Workers Rights: Rhetorical Resistance through Union Songs
Robin Ormiston, Old Dominion University
Drawing from field research conducted in 2010, this paper will historicize the mitigating cultural factors that helped to shape song as a powerful rhetorical modality for domestic service workers employed in South African society. Seeking social liberation, domestic service workers of South Africa have historically been twice excluded from the opportunity to discursively engage in the public sphere due to their privatized working environment. Women working as domestic service workers in South Africa face harsh conditions. But according to the South African Department of Labour, approximately one million women are employed as domestic service workers in South Africa, making that group the largest group of workers in South Africa.

096. Quilted Narratives: Reimagining Digital Media Tools as Form of Agency and Expression
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV

The purpose of this roundtable is to brainstorm and set into motion a collaborative project that makes strategic use of digital media and social networking tools to document and analyze the life stories of young women from different cultural communities in an effort to establish cross-cultural coalitions as a form of empowerment and agency. By focusing on "strategy use," the hope is that we will "think beyond" the current ways of using these tools and instead brainstorm methods of reimaging the tools in such a way that they can be used to stitch the lives and experiences of women together.

097. Today, Not Someday When We’re Grown: How Girls “Do” Activism
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV

This roundtable privileges the ongoing and diverse work of girl activists. Through presentations, video, poetry, artwork, and dialogue, girls and their allies will showcase a variety of activist projects that illustrate the innovative ways that girls do activism. Of particular interest are the varied spaces in which girls engage as activists: formally and informally, relationally and structurally, publically and privately. This roundtable will further explore girls’ activism techniques and offer new theorizations of doing feminist work with girls as the change agents of today—not the women of tomorrow.

An Image of Revolutionary Hope: Women of Color and U.S. Feminism in the 1970s
Agatha Beins, Rutgers University
This paper examines how images of women of color in feminist periodicals produced affective contours of feminism as a collective identity. I track the depictions of Sojourner Truth and figures of Indochinese women across a range of feminist periodicals published throughout the United States during the 1970s, paying attention to this repetition of imagery and to what is consistent and what varies in these representations. The frequency with which their images circulated through these publications indicates that their bodies were significant to the imagination and production of U.S. feminism.

The Cost of Empire: Slavery and Reproduction in Feminist Science Fiction
Erin Ranft, University of Texas, San Antonio
This paper argues that Octavia Butler’s Kindred and Phyllis Alesia Perry’s Sigmata re-envision history to voice narratives long silenced by dominant society and to portray enslaved women’s resistance. Utilizing the creative tropes of science fiction, the authors illustrate the bodily oppressions experienced by enslaved women. These texts disprove the notions that US slavery is only germane in a discussion about the past and that racism, sexism, and classism can be separated from such a discussion) for the legacy we experience.

Beyond the University Classroom: College Students Negotiating Privilege in a Community-Based Violence Prevention Project
Beth Callett, DePaul University, Amira Proweller, DePaul University
Women’s Studies is opportune for the union of feminist pedagogy and critical service learning goals. Unlike dominant models of service learning that have been largely oriented towards more traditional understandings of service as volunteerism and charity, emerging scholarship has called for critical and feminist informed frameworks of service learning pedagogy and practice that help students link what they are theorizing in the classroom to practice beyond the classroom. The proposed paper will explore the ways in which students in a service learning course extend the principles of feminist pedagogy and practice in their social justice work with teen youth.

Considering the “Divides”: Intersectionality, Technology, and Feminist praxis
Margaret Ji Rhee, University of California, Berkeley
Feminist engagement with new media technologies, outside the academic walls, models the necessity of community based participatory education for feminist pedagogy and praxis. I argue feminist technological education, such as digital storytelling, may be one possible way, to unbind heteronormative, patriarchal, and racialized hegemonic and structural constructions of difference. Moreover by tracing a lineage of feminist cyborg literature, with the scholarship on intersectionality, I provide for increased attention of the “divides”—structural inequality of incarceration, HIV/AIDS, and digital divide rates that “intersect” and shape women of color life chances.

Haven’t We Been Here Before? Feminist Pedagogies of Service Learning
Kate Summer Drabinski, University of Maryland, Baltimore County Curriculum planners across the disciplines are increasingly looking to service learning as a way to connect classroom learning and community engagement to prepare students for civic life. Service learning pedagogy stresses the importance of reflection, making connections between abstract classroom learning and concrete social practice, and critical thinking about our roles as citizens outside the ivory tower. Sound familiar? This presentation asks how insights gleaned from over 30 years of theorizing praxis in a women’s studies context can be brought to bear on some of the more vexing issues in contemporary service learning.

Women Enter Local Politics: A Case Study of Women as Political Representatives in India

This paper discusses the implications for democratic participation of women's incorporation into India's local political system. As EWRs, women emphasize their roles in addressing gender issues, legal problems, and prohibition. The public visibility of EWRs legitimizes greater physical mobility for women. EWRs provide role models of value for girls. These gains seem to point to a need for grassroots mobilization to enable their constituents to articulate their needs and hold EWRs accountable. Such mobilizations do exist, but they are few and far between and is much needed to challenge the control of local politics by dominant caste men.

Women as Political Representatives in India: The Case of Gender Quotas

Aparna Thomas, Cornell College, Iowa

As greater numbers of women contest elections, assessing their effects on local government councils becomes increasingly relevant. The state of Maharashtra was one of the first states to enact the legislation emphasizing the need for decentralization of PRIs and enhancing women's empowerment. This paper provides the background to the issue of gender quotas for women in Indian politics and provides a broad historical and institutional framework, and description of the structure of PRIs in Maharashtra. It will also demonstrate ways in which this context is tied to the development of other local institutions unique to the state.

Women as Political Actors: The Case of India's Decentralization Politics

Vidya Kalamadam, William Paterson University

Over the last two decades, women have become a major marker of democracy. Every government showcases the number of women in formal politics. Transnational monitoring organizations routinely rank the quality of a democracy by citing women's presence in its political bodies. Using the case of EWRs in Karnataka, this paper will interrogate the following. How can feminists theorize seemingly 'empowering' moments like the decentralization policy and women's presence in local councils for gender equity within the global context of neo-liberalism? How do state policies for increasing women's political participation transform patriarchal practices within the state and society?

Participatory Action Research

Sara Childers, University of Alabama

Based on a multi-sited ethnographic case study of a high-achieving, high-poverty high school, this paper looks at how high-achieving girls navigated and articulated their subjectivity at a predominantly black high school. While using Critical Race Theory, Feminist Theory, and Post-Structural Qualitative Research, I perform a discursive analysis of interview data and field observations to address the ways in which these students lived within and against the discursive constructions of a high-achieving white girl identity within the school and practiced and narrated themselves as raced/ gendered/educational subjects. This paper places considerable interest on how they appropriated white privilege in this high achieving urban high school.

Learning Teenage Black Girls' Experiences in a Social Club: A Qualitative Case Study

Jeena Williams, University of Alabama

The presentation reveals research findings that explored adolescent Black girls' experiences through involvement in a local community program in the southeastern region of the United States and how it relates to their academic career. Data for this study was collected from observations and semi-structured interviews with program participants. This data is significant because it provides parents/guardians, educators, and other stakeholders with information about Black girls' educational experiences to be able to provide support in various areas that extend beyond school walls. Possible implications are that educators and community members can develop collaborative efforts to assist and support Black girls which will support them in reaching their academic goals.

From the "Linguistic Turn" to the Metaphysical: Visionary Pragmatism, Spiritual Activism, and Indigenous Thought

Ana Louise Keating, Texas Woman's University

It is by now a commonplace for feminists and other contemporary theorists to critique the "linguistic turn" in poststructuralist thought. Rather than extend this critique, I take a different approach. Drawing on writings by Patricia Hill Collins, Gloria Anzaldúa, and Marilou Awiakta, as well as recent work in speculative realism and object-oriented philosophy, I posit a participatory theory of language, a metaphysics of intra-connectedness, that leads to relational epistemologies and ethics. These holistic modes of perception-action transform subject/object divisions into new forms of activism, demonstrating the important contributions that women-of-color theory can make to contemporary post-continental philosophy.

Active Bodies and Distributive Agency: Rethinking the Political in Contemporary Social Justice Activism

Lindsay Robertson, Texas Woman's University

Recent works in feminist theorizing emphasize distributive notions of agency across various bodies, both organic and inorganic. Rethinking agency as the ability to act on other subject/objects rather than a property one possesses has significant repercussions for conceptualizing social actors and the constitution of political spheres. Drawing from "new materialist" feminisms, as well as contemporary political and sociological theorists (Jane Bennett, Andrew Pickering, Bruno Latour), this paper explores how subterranean political bodies and contemporary queer social justice activism might be organized in response to the proliferation of agentic subjects.

Corn-ucopia: The Center, the Beginning, and the End

Angela Johnson-Fisher, Texas Woman's University

Pulsing with intelligence, inversely reciprocal in nature, simple yet complex, what we eat is more than just edible matter. Tracing corn as both food source and actant through myth (language) and ritual (action), I draw on the writings of Paula Gunn Allen, Marilou Awiakta, and Luisah Teish to show how the corn we grow and consume might, simultaneously, be growing and consuming us...functioning as a powerful catalyst for transformation. My goal is not to judge or condemn the food choices we make, but rather to explore the precarious yet complex bonds between corn, harmony, and human life.

Consumption Crisis: Building Reciprocal Relationships for Planetary Survival Through Connectual Politics

Pamela Kay White, Texas Woman's University

Typically, we view natural gas exploration as a unidirectional process: humans remove stored energy from plants and animals buried within the earth's crust. But what happens if we rewrite this script, viewing the shale, drill-bit, tubing, and everything else in the process as active agents, not passive objects? I explore this question through "connectual politics," a term I coined that resituates political issues within a framework of radical interconnectivity. More specifically, I draw on the Indigenous theory of "natural democracy," and Bennett's "vital materiality," to investigate how energy policy and consumption might change when we listen to non-humans.

“Could You Find a Different Word?”: Power Structures and Feminist Work in Higher Education
Rita Michelle Jones, Lehigh University

Foucault considers how power structures operate and ideologies are deployed, particularly in terms of coming from below and above. Within higher education, administration operates similarly: bring ideas to create the institution you want, but our version will look differently and be controlled by us. My discussion analyzes scenarios, including strategies to increase education about gender violence on campuses, that specifically deploy “feminism” but meet resistance to feminism because power on university campuses still varies between top-down models and shared governance, because non-hierarchical feminism threatens the abundance of “org charts,” and because most university faculty and staff still fear feminism.

The Genocide Awareness Project on the College Campus: Deploying a Feminist Response
Janet Badia, Indiana University/Purdue University, Fort Wayne

This paper examines the tactics used by the Genocide Awareness Project (GAP), a travelling anti-abortion display funded and produced by the Center for Bioethical Reform that uses graphic images of aborted fetuses to make the argument that abortion is genocide. As part of its examination, this paper investigates the GAP’s impact on college campuses, the challenges it poses to campus anti-harassment policies and civil discourse, and the failures of feminist and university responses to the GAP. Finally, it considers the ways the GAP might be understood as deploying some of militant feminism’s own tactics and the implications of that appropriation.

Advancing Women’s Leadership on a Catholic Campus: Overt and Covert Feminist Deployments
Sheila Hassell Hughes, University of Dayton

Engaging scholarship on women’s leadership in higher education from several disciplines, I argue that the complexity of organizational structures, institutional cultures, and broader social patterns inhibiting women’s advancement to roles of institutional leadership necessitates multi-pronged responses. A mixed strategy, including the deployment of feminist knowledge and politics both within and outside authorized roles and structures, will work best at some male-dominated institutions. A Catholic university where women faculty and professional staff are leveraging mid-level leadership positions to push for incremental changes, while also organizing unofficially to create a climate of greater urgency, serves as my case study.

109. Black Feminisms as Critical Pedagogy: Engaging Power, Privilege and Difference in the Classroom
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 5 - AV

This roundtable engages in a productive conversation regarding the dilemmas black women and men encounter using black feminisms as critical pedagogy. What is a black feminist pedagogy? Is it more than enabling students to analyze, critique and deconstruct racial and gender ideologies using intersectional paradigms? Is there a normative and/or political imperative to teaching black feminisms in the academy? If so, what is it? What are the challenges, limitations and implications of using black feminisms to teach students at this neoliberal juncture? More than this, how might we think about critical black feminist pedagogies in the so-called “post-racial” moment?

Imitation is the Sincerest Form of Flattery? Using Feminist Surveillance Studies to Theorize Biomimetics
Shoshana Magnet, Ottawa, Ontario, CA

Searching for soldiers that “never sleep and never bleed,” the US military is developing tiny electronic planes that combine animals and robots. One such creation, the “calibanator,” mixes moths with machines. During the pupal stage, electrodes and a chip are inserted into the moth. Once the moth has matured, it may be remotely controlled and used for military purposes. Robot insects also are proposed for use in surveillance. Grounding the growth of robot-animals in their development for military and surveillance purposes, I argue that the real world deployment of biomimetic robot-animal technologies depends upon practices of inscription, reading, and interpretation that are assumed to be transparent, neutral and self-evident, and yet remain complex, ambiguous and, as a result, inherently problematic. Exploring feminist surveillance studies as a theoretical framework, I will call into question assertions that “imitation is the sincerest form of flattery” and that mimicry of the natural world will necessarily yield productive and peaceful outcomes.

White Coats, White Doctors: The Flexner Report’s continued impact on Medical Student Education
Moya Zakia Bailey, Emory University

In 1910 Abraham Flexner, a leading U.S. educational scholar took on a task issued by the Carnegie Foundation to assess the curricular components of medical schools in the United States and Canada. His groundbreaking report transformed the practice of educating doctors, making institutions more standardized and uniform in their aim to educate the next generation of physicians. It is through his work that medical doctors became well-respected professionals with extensive and complex training. The Flexner Report is an essential document that created the context for medical education as we understand it today, effectively constructing the conditions for optimal medical education and the subsequent need for a particular type of student, an archetype that still informs medical student classes today.
Stolidity, Patience, and Dexterity': the Neglected History of Racialized Indigenous Women’s Labor in the U.S. Digital Industries
Lisa Nakamura, University of Illinois at Urbana, Champaign
When the Fairchild Corporation, a pioneering electronics manufacturer, opened a transistor fabrication plant on the Shiprock Navajo reservation in New Mexico 1970 they became the largest employer of Indians in the U.S. Most of these digital industries workers were Navajo women who were described by Fairchild executives, quality control engineers, and journalists as perfectly suited to this new style of ‘light industrial’ labor because of their cultural and physical traits. Their patience, dexterity, ability to visualize complex patterns, and “antimilitancy” or docility were cited as reasons for their remarkable productivity and success as digital workers. These traits were racialized as uniquely Navajo, an image of indigenous American women as digital model minorities that has been long forgotten. This neglected history of electronic worker surveillance and racial typing shaped the later racialization of women’s digital labor in Asia, and continues to emerge in contemporary discourses about gendered styles of digital work and workers.

Consuming Fetuses, Commodifying Bumps: Western Intended Parent Blogs and the Surveillance of Transnational Indian Surrogacy
Sayanati DasGupta, Columbia University
The phenomenon of transnational surrogacy, what has been sensationalized as the Indian ‘wombs for rent’ industry, is one example of a commercial trade made possible by not only the permeable real life national boundaries of a globalized world, but also through porous cybernetic ones. Transnational surrogacy brings into question the integrity of national bodies, and bodies politic, as well as gendered, racialized, and reproductive bodies. These (embodied) borderlands are policed only minimally by various state policies on surrogacy, gamete donation, and citizenship since policymakers are essentially playing catch-up to the rapidly changing ground realities of assistive reproductive technologies (ARTs), particularly on the transnational stage. This chapter will examine how Western Intended Parents (IPs) are doing the work of transnational surrogacy surveillance through online communities, by interrogating two cultural practices of Western IP bloggers: (1) the posting of online 3-D and 4-D ultrasound images of their fetuses gestating in the wombs of Indian surrogates and (2) the posting of ‘belly/bump shots’ of the surrogates themselves – i.e. usually headless images of (brown skinned, sari clad) surrogates’ misdirections. This chapter will draw from scholarly work on ultrasonographic pregnancy surveillance and gestational surrogacy to suggest that Western IPs are creating a cross-border cyber-nation whose primary purpose is to conduct surveillance upon Indian women’s reproductive bodies.

To participate in the epistemological project of writing Black women into Black Canada, some scholars (Dua and Robinson, 1999, Bannerje, 2003) insist that an anti-racist feminist framework /theory/thought is more useful especially in delineating Black women’s location in a white settler colony as Canada. Influenced by African-American feminists, others aim to develop and articulate a specific Black Canadian feminist thought (Wane Delinious and Lawson 2002; Massagué and Wane 2007). This presentation attend to the spaces or gaps in current feminist theorizing on the Black women in Canada.

"I am a Woman, but Not That Woman": Black Queer Womyn Attending Women's Colleges in the South
Shannon J. Miller, Minnesota State University, Mankato
Women's colleges often function as spaces to empower women in the midst of societal gender oppression. This is particularly evident in the area of academic achievement as, in general, women at single-sex colleges are more academically engaged than women at coeducational institutions. Nevertheless, women's colleges are not synonymous with feminism and can still promote heteropatriarchy through their policies and traditions. In this paper, I explore the experiences of 16 black-queer-womyn undergraduates and alumnae of two southern women's colleges, one historically Black and one predominantly White. Through conversations, they recount how their college experiences positively and negatively impacted their Black queer identities.

Re-Deploying Gender Norms in Disabled/Nondisabled Relationships
Sarah Rainey, Bowling Green State University
This paper presents original research with disabled/nondisabled couples who deploy gender norms in creative and ironic ways. Their revisions of traditional gender roles counter dominant narratives about disabled/nondisabled intimate relationships and queer popular understandings of sex and care.

Terror and the Queer South: Exposing Cultural Narratives of Regional Supremacy and Heterosexual Patriotism
Jennifer Purvis, The University of Alabama
This paper explores the intersections of Terrorism Studies and Queer Theory to illuminate persistent narratives of sexuality concerning the Queer South, and it exposes the mechanisms by which we 'other' the South (and especially the Deep South) in narratives of regional supremacy and sexual normalcy in the U.S. cultural landscape.

We Say We Love Each Other: Dialogues on Love, Gender, and Justice
Durell Maurice Callier, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign; Dominique Cacine Hill, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
Deploying women of color feminism, this co-authored text re-imagines intimate relationships within the Black community. Recognizing the limiting realities and legacies of heteropatriarchy and white supremacy in creating essentialist hierarchical dichotomies for the assumed relationship between Black males and females, we—queer and Black—assume no need for the possibility of a heterosexual encounter to love one another (hooks 2004, Collins 2005). Utilizing poetry, writing as a method of inquiry (Richardson 1997), and dialogue, we theorize love beyond romantic heterosexual desires and patriarchal, gendered scripts of acceptability and respectability in the name of racial solidarity and progress.

116. Feminisms * Masculinities + Men / NWSA = Welcome to the Feminist Masculinities Interest Group!
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 2: Valdosta
The newly formed NWSA Interest Group in Feminist Masculinities was born out of a 2009 conference panel. In its first year, more than 200 members have joined. This session serves as an open discussion, community meeting, and town hall discussion. What relationships do we, as an association, envision developing further as feminist masculinities scholarship continues to grow in presence and popularity. What are OUR investments in this interest area? Please join us for a lively, invigorating, and challenging conversation—and help us shape the trajectory of this new community within NWSA.

PARTICIPANTS:

A Glimpse into the Families of Latina Immigrants Using Photovoice
Joy E. Cecil-Dryakcz, University of North Carolina, Greensboro; Mary Y. Morgan, University of North Carolina, Greensboro
The purpose of the research project was to allow participants to document and critique their family and community conditions through photographs and stories of their everyday lives. This study used photovoice, a participatory action research methodology, with eight immigrant Latinas in a southern state in the U.S. Key themes were identified using interpretive inquiry to illustrate their experiences, with “improvements with sacrifices” as the overarching theme. The project empowered the participants by affirming their community strengths and providing them with an avenue for sharing their stories with others.

Before Blogs: Alternative Feminist Publications and Intergenerational Activism
Miranda Welch, University of Wisconsin
Alternative feminist publications such as local, feminist poetries of the 1970s, grrl zines of the 1990s, and contemporary feminist blogs have commonalities in production, publication, distribution, and function, despite being generally considered as separate by both media studies and histories of feminism. I argue that these works are empowering pieces of activism, embodying theories of identity and oppression while providing an accessible entry to the public sphere for women. This project attempts to resituate understandings of both second and third space feminisms and suggests a new intergenerational dialogue through consideration of largely unrecognized bodies of work.

Beyond Subversion and Consolidation?: A Critical Analysis of Agency from an Islamic Feminist Perspective
Lisa R. Frazier, Emory University
This paper analyzes and critiques recent feminist interpretations of Muslim women’s agency since the postsecular turn. Postsecular feminists have mainly posited that Muslim women enact agency outside of the paradigm of subversion and consolidation by discursively constituting themselves as moral subjects. As such, women may consolidate socio-political and religious norms while still practicing agency. A critical analysis of work by Saba Mahmood and Ousseina Alidou reveals both the utility and inadequacy of such a paradigm of agency. Ultimately I offer alternative conceptions of agency from an Islamic feminist standpoint, gesturing towards more labile frameworks of agency in relation to power.

Classical Ballet: The Land that Feminism Forgot
Anna Teresa Rigles, Portland State University
Feminist activism has been changing the way in which people define “woman,” it has yet to reach classical ballet. Giselle, Swan Lake and La Bayadere are three classic ballets which clearly demonstrate the heterosexism, racism and homophobia that still infest the world of classical ballet and create an unrealistic and unreachable image of what a woman is and should be. By using these three ballets as a template and questioning ballet dances between the ages of 10-18 years to define “woman” in ballet I will demonstrate how ingrained gender stereotyping, racism, sexism and homophobia is in classical ballet.

Corporate Menstruation: The Takeover of Online Menstruation Information Dissemination
Ciara Anna Bush, University at Albany
Some scholars have argued that the openness with which mainstream mensturation product producers are talking about menstrual breaks down barriers and creates a more open dialogue. Instead, as many other scholars agree, they are reinforcing a culture of shame and silence surrounding menstruation, and furthermore, primarily trying to sell a product. Your women are finding a lot of autonomy through the internet, and so I believe it is important to analyze what they might be discovering on their own, and how corporations are deploying what looks like girl power and femininism while really expounding on the same old tired truisms.

De-Gendering Intimate Partner Violence Curriculums: New Strategies for Victims of Same-Sex Intimate Partner Violence
Whitney Shadowens, University of Florida
Same-sex intimate partner violence (SSIPV) remains marginalized and understudied in academia and social services. Some previous studies argue that research should be based on gender norms and how they perpetuate the violence between the couple. While helpful, this overlooks the fact that gender in same-sex relationships may be complicated and non-normative. IPV can no longer be typecast in the male as batterer/female as victim binary. Instead, it should be viewed outside of a heteronormative frame without referring to gender as its main explanation. My presentation focuses on how IPV functions in same-sex relationships and what specific issues a curriculum must address.

Enacting Masculinity: Gender Performance in the Southern Baptist Convention
Rita Anne Snyder Furr, Oregon State University
This paper explores feminist poststructuralist theory and its contribution to understanding masculine gender identities within the SBC utilizing the concept of gender performativity. This provides a theoretical foundation to better understand how masculinity is embodied and produced. Drawing on Judith Butler's work on gender performativity in Gender Trouble and Undoing Gender, this project is engaging in a direct observation at the 2011 Southern Baptist Convention Annual Meeting to analyze how masculine gender identities are performed and enacted.
Exploited Women’s Labor in the Global Market
Juan Carlos Acosta, State University of New York, Brockport
This poster will trace ways the global market impacts feminist efforts to stabilize and further women’s labor contributions. Using Eisenstein’s Feminism Exploited Women’s Labor in the Global Market (2009), this poster explores how global markets co-opt feminisms and consumer capital. As outlined in the Politics of Crisis theme research conclusions consider, “How can we fashion a feminist policy analysis of what is happening in the global economy?” and, “To what extent do current aid re-building efforts reproduce unequal economic and social relations of power within and between nations?”

Facebook and the Transformation of Agency and Feminist Activism
Tracy Lynn Hawkins, Claremont Graduate University
My poster explores the ways that the concept of agency is being transformed through the use of social networking sites such as Facebook. Using the work of Judith Butler as a background, my poster will suggest that agency on Facebook in some ways demonstrates and in some ways challenges Butler’s theory of mutually and contextual produced agency. This discussion of agency will conclude with theorizing the ways that the agency of individuals as it is produced on Facebook also has a profound impact on the possibilities for the future of feminist activism.

Fat Bias Among Social Work Practitioners
Messa Ann McCordle, Molloy College
This poster presentation will provide the findings from a study designed to assess fat bias among social work clinicians and to determine its potential impact on practice. Findings indicate that this is a serious issue, requiring social work practitioners to reconsider their attitudes and beliefs about clients. Clinician-focused interventions will be discussed.

Feminism, Familism and Academia: Ideological Barriers to Latina Education
Amy Staer, Emory University
Latina college completion rates constitute a crisis in higher education and for our greater society, expanding the socioeconomic chasm which reproduces over time. While empirical data has documented tangible barriers, the powerful social norms resulting from dominant ideologies require further examination. This poster considers the crisis of Latina higher education participation from a theoretical perspective. Through examination of three primary ideologies, feminism, familialism, and contemporary academia, this poster will explore how cultural production of each ideology creates intersectional and potentially immovable barriers to the educational achievements of Latina women. Important questions on re-deploying feminism within academia are posed.

Girl-Leaders Confront White Privilege: Young Women Bridging Difference to Build Community
Caroline Ruth McFadden, University of Central Florida
This poster displays girls’ conceptualizations of identity, privilege, community and leadership. Based on a research project analyzing the impact of white privilege education on middle-school girls’ leadership development, this poster features both narrative and artistic representations of such outcomes. Specifically, through journal entries and quilt patches produced by girls, we are able to visualize answers to the following inquiries: If young women are encouraged to think critically about their identities, will it alter how they imagine and create community? Does an awareness of racial/ethnic privilege influence how girls understand and perform leadership?

Hearing the Subaltern Voices Speak: Women in the Naxalite Movement of West Bengal, India (1967-75)
Pooja Chaudhuri, University of California, Berkeley
The Naxalite period (1967-75) began as a radical communist uprising in the State of West Bengal (India) that spread across the country and became one of the bloodiest moments in Indian history. In rewriting the history of this time period, I suggest that both the movement and its State-sponsored backlash relied on the sanctioned institution of gender difference to construct a framework for the struggle. I argue that this strategic manipulation of gender in the initial unfolding of the movement has enabled rape of women as a weapon in the present-day war between the Maoists and the Indian State.

“If Boys Would be Men, Would Women be Ladies?”: Gender in Christian Youth Culture
Beth Shively, The Ohio State University
“If boys would be men, would women be ladies?” Christian author Joshua Harris poses this question in his relationship self-help book for young singles, Boy Meets Girl: Say Hello to Courtship. Using the language of feminism, Harris acknowledges that women suffer from living in a “chauvinistic” culture. However, he argues that the solution to a chauvinistic culture is a return to essentialist gender roles, where men are leaders and women are protected under their authority. This paper explores the colonization of feminist ideas and language by the Christian courtship movement and broader Christian youth culture.

It Was Just a Joke: Misogynistic Humor, Masculinity, and Rape Culture on College Campuses
Emily Rose Scrivani, State University of New York, College at Brockport
This poster focuses on ways students on college campuses reproduce and sustain rape culture through humor. Jokes about race, class, disability status and religion foster outrage in these communities, whereas sexist and homophobic jokes are generally accepted. This trend in college-educated individuals devaluing and de-facing women and the LGBTQ community is a growing problem. Using the theoretical frameworks of Crenshaw, McRobbie, Collins, and Kimmel, this poster analyzes how we can use offensive behavior to deploy feminisms that correct this cultural phenomenon of humorous misogyny and patent acceptance of anti-feminist jokes to derail the prevalence of rape culture on college campuses.

Inspiration to Plantation? A Black Womyn’s Journey through Graduate School & Beyond
Lisa Covington, Clarion University of Pennsylvania
hooks finds class is an issue that is ignored and this discipline is intended to allow space where students from underprivileged backgrounds can speak from their position. I would argue that “feminist” classrooms allow for students from various social positions the ability to voice their opinions and concerns without repercussions. Through implementing feminist pedagogy, hooks’ encourages us to speak our truths often with only the options of being obedient and quiet or empowered to disrupt the social order of the classroom. I will explore hooks’ notion of silence and obedience through pedagogical strategies.

119. Reframing of Sisterhood: Pathways to Voice for African and African American Women in Women’s Studies
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV
Sisterhood is a concept that has multiple meanings depending on one’s social and cultural location. For some, the term “sisterhood” refers to the biological and genetic state of being sisters. In our workshop, “sisterhood” will be defined as a community of sisters forming solidarity to oppose shared conditions. In using this definition one can historically examine various periods from the Women’s Suffrage Movement to the current interactions in some Women’s Studies departments. While women as a whole have made great strides, African and African American women continue to fight for their right to sit at the table and be heard.

120. Hey, Shorty!: Young Women of Color Take Research Out of the Academy
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV
This roundtable will speak to the ways the youth organizers in Girls for Gender Equity’s Sisters in Strength program are using information obtained from self-conducted participatory action research on sexual harassment in the NYC public schools to hold oppressive institutions accountable for their lack of attention to this pressing issue. The presenters will speak about the ways educational environments are hostile to girls and LGBTQ youth, and present youth-centered and citywide coalition building strategies that can be implemented to shift the heterocentric and homophobic dynamics at play in order to make schools safer and more welcoming for all students.

121. Feminist Moves: A Multi-disciplinary, Multi-media Performance on Representations of the Body
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV
This session will inquire into cultural representations of women’s bodies—as readers, subjects of art, expressions of emotions and health, and in writing—through a multi-layered, hybrid performance that combines scholarly inquiry, personal narrative and poetry, and live music. Texts include critical inquiry into Sylvia Plath’s poetry, women surrealist artists, and personal narratives on the body and emotions. We seek not only to articulate arguments about bodies, their representation, and the spaces in which they exist, but also to render experiences of the body, inviting the audience to re-imagine the relationship between their own experience of word, image, sound, and movement with the realm of abstract thought and rationality. This performance will enact the arguments it makes regarding the patriarchal disconnect between mind and body as well as offer spaces to re-envision other, more reciprocal relationships that reach beyond difference as well as embody it.

Then, Duck and Cover; Now, Unsnap and Cover!: The Emergency Bra as Public Health Desire and Sexualized Defense
Clare Jen, Denison University
In 2009, Dr. Elena Bodnar’s Emergency Bra won the IgNobel Public Health Prize. Organized by Annals of Improbable Research, the awards winkingly applaud “research that makes people laugh and then think.” In an emergency, a woman unsnaps her “sexy red” Emergency Bra, secures one cup to her nose and mouth, and secures the other to the “lucky man of her choice.” This paper examines how the deployment of this creative “feminist” product (re)shapes narratives of a woman’s responsibility to the protection of her health, her family and, in turn, the (trans)national body, through meanings of gender, heterosexuality and nation.

Beyond Tantric Tricks: Racialization of Asians and Asian Americans on Sacred Sex Websites
L. Aya Saraswati P, University of Hawaii
In American pop culture, “Eastern” sexual practices and philosophies have been constructed as something that are different from, if not mythically better than, the Western ones. This paper examines seventy-five Sacred Sex (Indian Tantric and Chinese Taoist and Zen) websites to understand how gendered and racialized discourses and tropes of Eastern sexuality are employed and commodified on these websites. Moreover, by intersecting discourses of sexuality and spirituality, this paper seeks to understand how Tantric and Taoist Goddesses (women who teach and provide sacred sex services) reframe sexual practices as healing and empowering for them.

“The Political Economy of Sexual Violence and Affect in Transnational Texts”
Barbara Shaw, Allegheny College
In 2009, Dr. Elena Bodnar’s Emergency Bra won the IgNobel Public Health Prize. Organized by Annals of Improbable Research, the awards winkingly applaud “research that makes people laugh and then think.” In an emergency, a woman unsnaps her “sexy red” Emergency Bra, secures one cup to her nose and mouth, and secures the other to the “lucky man of her choice.” This paper examines how the deployment of this creative “feminist” product (re)shapes narratives of a woman’s responsibility to the protection of her health, her family and, in turn, the (trans)national body, through meanings of gender, heterosexuality and nation.

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV
Participants:
Popular Feminism and the Oprah Factor
Janell Hobson, State University of New York, Albany
This paper will examine the influence and symbolism of Oprah Winfrey as a popularization of feminism. While Oprah Winfrey’s franchise subscribes to a conservative view of womanhood and female self-empowerment, her representations and transformation of TV and film have left indelible impressions about black female agency and, subsequently, have constructed a legible portrayal of black feminism writ large. From the launching of black feminist literary works through her national book club to her OWN network, Oprah functions as both a global capitalist and cultural revolutionary, hence complicating her potential role as a "popular feminist."

Jaelle Monae's Collective Vision: Post-Soul Eccentricity as Black Feminist Intervention
Francesca Therese Royster, DePaul University
Hip-Hop performer Janelle Monae brings her funky, energized and collective approach to the ongoing questions posed by Post-Soul feminist queer eccentricity: how to negotiate the "tightrope" of black authenticity to create original art? Her work is distinctly feminist in her historicized performances of black female bodies and in her embrace of outsider/ eccentric or strange forms of gender performance. This paper will examine Monae's performances, which address issues of power: the dehumanization of the commercial marketing of black performance, the ways that capitalism manages to appropriate the underground, and the always present pushback of that underground to keep creating.

Defying Gender Stereotypes and Racial Norms: Naming African American Women’s Realities in Hip-Hop and Neo-Soul Music
R. Dianne Barlow, California State University, Northridge
Music provides a site where African American women challenge the imposition of gender and racial inferiority and seek instead to redefine themselves and their experiences on their own terms. The realities reflected in the music of India Arie, Mary J. Blige, and M C Jhip Hop and Ndegeocello are premised on several key themes: the need for self-definition, respect in heterosexual love relationships, empowerment through self-esteem, and the need to challenge homophobia that exists in many African-American communities. The songstress of this paper will examine the popular constructions of black womanhood and create a public consciousness for defiance and cultural resistance.

Three Daisy Selling: Marketing a Tween Girl Consumer Culture
Amy Rose Scott, State University of New York, Albany
Commodified tween girl consumer culture often uses the mantra of "girl power" as an effective selling tool, but to what end? Using standpoint theory, analyze three examples of "girl culture" to determine if they are created from authentic means in a grassroots way or if they are truly commercialized and manufactured. What these examples teach us about the role of consumerism and its impact on the future of civic participation from potential young feminists is significant. Will products teach subtle hegemonic lessons about race, class and gender or critical thinking about products inspire activism?

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 10
This engaged participatory roundtable, facilitated by three senior Women's Studies scholars, will critically explore the emergence and presence of Asian North American Feminisms (in this context, those whose backgrounds originate from east and southeast Asia and the pacific islands) in Women's Studies despite its active presence in other domains of social life. Continuing with the theme, difficult dialogues, transforming thought and practices of feminisms, we invite those who identify as Asian North American feminists, to join the roundtable in examining our absent presence in Women's Studies. Invited scholars will present short position statements as starting points for dialogue and action.

Fit to be Feminists: Biopower and the Modern Construction of Women's Health
Karissa Butler-Wall, University of Minnesota
This paper investigates the International Conference of Women Physicians held by the Young Women's Christian Association in New York in 1919, as a watershed moment in the development of modern feminist biopolitics. With the achievement of women's suffrage, feminists turned increasingly to the arena of "health betterment," employing scientific methods and language to advocate for "normal, healthy lives" for all women. This paper examines the ways in which these feminists articulated new links between physical and mental health, utilizing newly established medical and psychological discourses to construct a modern narrative of healthy womanhood structured by race, ability and (hetero)sexuality.
Embracing Chaos: A Queer Analysis of Disability Narrative
Angela Megan Carter, University of Minnesota
In The Wounded Storyteller Arthur W. Frank asserts that such disabled storytellers often find themselves, at least momentarily, trapped in a state of chaos. Attempts to speak from this positionality end in what he calls the "chaos narrative," an "anti-narrative" that cannot actually be told, or understood. By utilizing queer and crip theories, this paper examines the underlying hegemony of this prevailing, further pathologizing narrative analysis. When heard not only are these "wounded" storytellers quite intelligible, they give voice to an otherwise silenced population and refute the very notions used to dismiss them.

Psychology or Social Justice? Personal Narratives from the Adoption Triad
Jessica Marie Petocz, University of Minnesota
Adoption practices have produced and relied upon psychoanalytical, medical, and sociological research on birthmothers, adoptees, and adoptive families. However, members of the adoption triad have also produced their own narratives of the adoption experience in order to counter the pathological depictions found in expert discourse. Theoretically, these parties may seem equally disempowered by the role of expertise in adoption, however, a closer examination of their personal narratives reveals their varying structural relationships to power and privilege, particularly race and class. By doing such a reading, this presentation helps us understand the historical and cultural tensions within the adoption community.

Constructing Ab/Normality: The Transsexual Phenomenon and The Moynihan Report
Elias Vitulli, University of Minnesota
In this paper, I will perform a queer reading across Harry Benjamin's The Transsexual Phenomenon (1966) and The Moynihan Report (1965) to examine how each construct racialized, gendered, sexualized, and dis/abled models of normality and abnormality. I will argue that these texts are both helped to construct hegemonic notions of normality and abnormality in the mid-1960s. Both are centrally concerned with the promotion and entrenchment of Whiteness, heteronormativity, and able-bodiedness as the normal and the pathologization of non-Whiteness and alternative/non-normative masculinity, femininity, sexual and familial structures, and embodiments as abnormal.

The Ripped Umbrella: Examining the Failure of the Terminology of "Transgender" to Unite and Transform
Joelle Ruby Ryan, University of New Hampshire
Due to the emergence of significant trans political struggle and academic queer theory/gender studies in the early 1990s, the terminology of TV/Ts (transvestite/transsexual) was changed to "transgender." Transgender was supposed to serve as an "umbrella term" to unite heterogeneous constituencies of gender outlaws, such as transsexuals, cross-dressers, drag kings/queens and genderqueers. Twenty years later, I examine the effectiveness of this nomenclature, and utilize the contentious trans Blogosphere and interviews with diverse trans activists to demonstrate that while the move perhaps had noble political and theoretical intentions, in actuality it has caused significant intercine battles, promoted community fractures and furthered subversionist.

Normative Gender Attribution: An Analysis of "Cisgender" Terminology in the Trans-Community
Regina Mariam Wright, Brandeis University
The term "cisgender" was coined in 1995 by transsexual man Carl Buijs and then popularized through the use of the related term "cissexual" by transsexual woman Julia Serano in her 2007 book Whipping Girl. Cisgender is used to refer to someone's sex and gender matching and has replaced the older nomenclature—"genetic" and "biological"—when talking about normative gender. Through a content analysis of Internet blogs, I examine both the productive and problematic ways that cis-terminology is used and argue that cisgender works primarily as a gender attribution and critique of gender privilege rather than as a gender identity.

129. Disability/Feminism/Poetry/Embodiment/Performance Workshop
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 13

This workshop will share experiences and insights from the Bay Area Disability/Feminism/Poetry/Embodiment/Performance workshop, a collection of artists/activists who use practice-as-research methods to explore connections between experimentalism, the histories of feminisms, and the poetics of embodiment. After introducing some of the workshop participants, the workshop will be practical, offering gentle movement work that can be done seated or from the floor. What happens when you let images and poetry of challenge and healing roll down your veins? We will honor all forms of embodiment, and learn about access and respect together, in a pedagogy of love. We end on a q+a.

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 2

PARTICIPANTS:
Disappearing Feminist Activism of the 1970s
Stephanie Gilmore, Dickinson College
Feminists in the 1970s changed the political and cultural landscape, creating the largest social movement of the 20th century. However, as feminism continues into the 21st, activists are left to recreate feminism anew in a wave that is directed toward the same agenda items as the one before. In this paper, I explore how feminist legislation and language is actively being disappeared—for example, "rape" rarely appears in news coverage of rape and their victims; "abortion" is a four-letter word; students today have no idea that Title IX affords them equal access to ALL facets of education, not just sports. By disappearing feminism in the 1970s—and by not fighting back by writing our histories—feminists today replicate much of the work of their predecessors. Through a blend of contemporary observations and interviews with young feminists and historical memoirs, interviews, and secondary scholarship on "second-wave" feminism, I explore the ways in which feminism has been disappeared and posit ways to fight back.
Women's Studies Versus "The Real World:" Movement Internships and the Depression of the Feminist Political Imaginary

Judith Taylor, University of Toronto

Feminist organizations are in a heightened period of institutionalization, many of them grant and government funded, long term, advocacy and service provision hybrids. How does the rationalized and pragmatic culture of feminist work that exists in such organizations impact Women's Studies students when they move from the classroom to become interns within them? While Women's Studies has encouraged praxis, or the testing of feminist theory in real world contexts, such encouragement was intended to improve feminist theory rather than simply chasten it. Based on interviews with 25 Women's Studies students who interned in feminist organizations, this paper analyzes how students' expectations for social change and innovation so often become depressed in the course of their internships, discussing the reasons why this likely happens, and the significant cases in the study in which it did not. Drawing attention to internship etiquette, intergenerational interaction, and movement institutionalization, this paper raises questions about the relationship between Women's Studies and other feminist organizations in the development of students' political consciousness. Internships put Women's Studies in its place, radical modification of what is possible and how to see the world and make change. Students conclude irrespective of whether they have a positive experience or a negative one, Women's Studies is a social justice bubble and their experiences with feminists on the ground curtail their expectations for what they can contribute.

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 3

This roundtable will examine one women's studies community-based learning course from the perspectives of the community partners, two students, and the professor. This will lead to a broader discussion with the audience on how to build an effective partnership with community organizations; how to ensure that the work benefits the community organization, the students and the course objectives; what the outcomes are of a community based learning course for both the students and the community partners; and the challenges and benefits of community based learning.

A New Narrative about Subverting the Master's Tools: Consciousness-Raising and the Constructions of Gay Anti-Racism by Black and White Men Together in the early 1980's
K. L. Broad, University of Florida

In this paper I describe how a group of gay men in the early 1980s describe their anti-racist consciousness-raising work in their newsletters. This paper is grounded in an interpretivist social constructionist approach, which means I discuss these newsletter accounts themselves as part of the process of consciousness-raising among members. I describe how these accounts about consciousness-raising in the newsletters constitute reconsiderations of "gayness" and name core concerns (e.g. interracial relationships and intersectional perspectives) central to (gay) anti-racist work at that time.

An Intersectional Analysis of Gender and Race for Sexual Minorities who Engage in LGB Activism
Breanne Fahs, Arizona State University

Social movements aimed at increasing rights for sexual minorities have recently gained momentum, yet studies on why LGBs from a variety of racial backgrounds join and participate in these collective actions are rare. This study identified the key factors that inspired, for 285 US LGB participants, four types of LGB activism: voting, petition signing, protesting, and civil disobedience. Results explore the role of publicly revealing one's sexual identity and experiencing heterosexist discrimination as increasing LGB activism, regardless of race or gender. Significant race and gender differences were noted, particularly for white gay men and Latina and Native American lesbians.

Maybe Next Year?: Gendering HIV/AIDS Activism
Ayana Weekley, Grand Valley State University

This paper explores the history of women activists in ACT/UP and affiliated organizations responding to HIV/AIDS. ACT/UP has been portrayed as a white, gay male organization, however there was a very active Women's Caucus that successfully demanded that the CDC expand their HIV/AIDS definition to include symptoms specific to women. Using archival records from ACT/UP and the Lesbian Herstory Archives I argue that women were important activists in the AIDS movement. Reconceptualizing the activism of women in HIV/AIDS organizing will help us reexamine the way HIV/AIDS has or has not been taken up as a "feminist" issue.

133. Breaking Barriers, Channeling Energy: Feminist Social Media in Action
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 5 - AV

This workshop will examine how women's use of social media has or has not translated into social power? How has women's use of social media changed our lives and our communities? How do we measure the impact of the feminism blogosphere and social networking? This workshop will present the research methods of the presenters to answer this question and invite participants to share their impact of use. The goal is to understand not only how but if women's studies without walls gives women more power than its previous traditions.

Kashmir: Racisms of State, a Feminist Analysis
Angana Chatterji, California Institute of Integral Studies

Kashmir: Mass graves, extra-judicial killings, draconian laws, disappearances, "half-widows," inculcable violations. Kashmir's iconic status in the Indian imaginary as a symbol of statist unification permits the domestication of Muslim subjects to Hindu majoritarian rule. Citing the work of the International People's Tribunal on Human Rights and Justice in India and the People's Tribunal in Kashmir I elaborate on military governance and the shaping of a people's tribunal to solicit counter-memory. In what ways might the work of "writing Kashmir" constitute a feminist praxis, one that integrates critiques of gendered violence and attention to the complex labor of witnessing as intervention instantiated by the People's Tribunal?

Discourses on the Parchment of Kashmir: Gender, Community, and Nationhood
Nyla Ali Khan, University of Oklahoma

Since the inception of armed insurgency in Kashmir in 1989 women in Kashmir have borne the brunt of sexualized violence. Innate conservatism in Kashmiri society disables women from describing and condemning sexual exploitation, so no statistical data on rapes and molestationes in the State exists. In addition to those of activists and academics, I will present the results of oral testimonies from rural women that reveal their inability to retaliate against the harassment of militia groups, and look at how their helplessness is easily exploited by the radical conservative feminism of Islam groups such as the Dukhtaran-i-Milat.

135. Sexual Politics, Neoliberalism and Policy Transformation
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 7

PARTICIPANTS:
Sex, Sustainability Politics and Neoliberalism
Amy Lind, University of Cincinnati

Typically, development frameworks of sustainability and social rights rarely, if ever, speak to each other, except through discourses which place the blame of "underdevelopment" and "overpopulation" on poor women's bodies—both literally and figuratively. In neoliberal contexts, this is exacerbated by states that aim to place additional pressures on women to conform to (still) normative, reproductivist standards codified by market norms. In this paper I examine the assumptions behind sustainability and social rights discourses of social reproduction, and propose an understanding of sustainability that takes into account gender and sexual desire as central to the materiality of social life.

Care, Neoliberalism, and Disposable Population
Drucilla Barker, University of South Carolina

The concept of caring labor has been articulated in a way that implicitly... casts the problem of care as a problem for individuals and families who enjoy the privileges of citizenship and are entitled to protection from the state. Certain groups are being cast as model citizens, while others are marked by sexual, racial, national, and class difference. The former are the ones deserving and demanding of care, while the latter are often the ones providing it. This is the real paradox of care and ignoring it veils the global circuits of money and people that support it.

Diverse Care Arrangements and Neoliberal Development Policy
Suzanne Bergeron, University of Michigan, Dearborn
Current attempts to alleviate inadequate care provision through development policy have had limited success, in part because these policies are framed through neoliberal and heteronormative agendas that focus primarily on strengthening traditional family forms and privatizing care. In this paper, I argue that taking into account the needs of a diversity of affective and care arrangements—including same-sex partnerships, global households, single parent households, and extended family arrangements—creates the possibility for new approaches to care and for new alliances to emerge that could strengthen support for policy transformation.

Sexual Politics and Transitional Governance in Post-Conflict Serbia
Sonnet Seeborg Gabbard, University of Cincinnati
After 13 years of international trade sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro, and Serbia's recent application to join the European Union (EU) in 2009, the nation is on the brink of major change in the international community. With EU integration looming, there has been a resurgence in preserving the national identity, including a reinvestment in gender norms and the 'national family.' By incorporating areas of feminist theoretical inquiry, including feminist security studies, transitional justice theory, and sexuality studies, I consider how transitional governance has created a gender norms 'crisis,' contributing to the rise in anti-gay violence and hyper-heteronormative nationalism.

136. Feminist Editing: Another One of the "Master's Tools"? Or Can It Transform the Academy?
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 8
Drawing on our experiences as teachers and long-time editors of Feminist Teacher students who recently took a course titled "Editing FT Prac-ticum," and a student who has both taken the course and served as an academic apprentice in the practicum, this roundtable explores what it means to practice explicitly feminist editing (as opposed to the work of an editor who happens to be a feminist). In what ways do methods of antiracist and feminist activism conflict with and/or inform our practices as editors, writers, and teachers? To what extent can feminist editing be a means of transmitting knowledge that fosters feminist transformation?

Feminism and Erotic Dance in U.S. History
Red Vaughan Tremmel, Tulane University
Since 1866 when Lydia Thompson first performed burlesque in industrializing American cities, female dancers have aroused both popular devotion among audiences and powerful critiques. For over a century feminists have grappled with the high stakes that are involved in the objectification and personification of the feminine erotic. This paper draws on the theory of Audre Lorde and Michel Foucault and over two dozen oral histories with burlesque dancers who performed 1940-1970 to better understand the complicated relationship between feminism and erotic dance in United States History. This paper also examines how the transformation of burlesque from narrative strip tease to go-go to pole dancing influenced feminist responses to stripping as well as generated a new revival during the 1990s.

How Did We Get Queer? Sex, Politics, and Queer Neo-Burlesque
Maura Ryan, Georgia State University
This paper explores the queer erotic representations of female-feminine bodies using ethnographic accounts of queer burlesque performances. Specifically, I argue that the popularity of burlesque in queer communities coincides with the community's avowal of a radical sex positive culture and that the use of queer feminine bodies achieves a particular kind of radical eroticism. I use social movement theories on political generations to talk about how feminist and queer conversations about sexual ethics have created an art form that is public, visible, and unapologetic in its sexual representations.

"Queens of the Damned:Native American "Cannibal" Women and Self Definition"
Kimberly Davis, Cumberland University
European and Colonial prescription of the original sin, immorality and out of control female power were articulated in these folkloric tales. There is also a theme underneath these folkloric tales of women in power, women expressing and experimenting with their own sexuality, and using fantastical creatures and myths to shape their social and political lives. Using Native American narratives, gothic literature, and reported cases of female carnivalism, vampirism and witchcraft my argument will show how women struggled to define, control, and shape their own identities through folklore.

To Eat You With My Eyes: Female Sexuality and "Forbidden Fruit" in Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market
Jennifer Butler, Cumberland University
Goblin Market illustrates women as innocent and obedient, yet at the same time, Rossetti created a secondary woman beneath the surface, one that goes against societal norms and gives in to temptation. Upon first glance,
Rossetti's Goblin Market seems to be a simple children's story, but further exploration unveils the sexual connotation. Although most analyses of "Goblin Market" are strictly speculation, the roles time, nature, and temperature play to distinguish both death from life and chasteness from corruption is certain.

Bring It, Bit#@!: Motherhood in Science Fiction Film
Jasper Driskill, Cumberland University

Science fiction film is traditionally a genre dominated by male characters, directors, and screenwriters. When female characters appear, they tend to fluctuate between hapless victim or sex kitten. However, there were several scifi films from the early 1990s which sought to redefine the role of motherhood. In films like Gremlins, Aliens, and Supernova transgressive actions by the maternal characters seek to recast ideas of "normal" mothers.

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 2: Savannah 2

The language of business has become a standard part of the academic community, and for those who support activism on college campuses, difficult challenges emerge. Must a women's studies program contribute to the "bottom line"? Should we argue that teaching diversity is right because it is "good business"? Using the business "case" to justify our programs is often antithetical to our understanding of our educational mission. Nevertheless, many in women's and gender studies programs have found that it is only this language which forwards agendas. Our presentation will discuss ways to both manipulate and circumvent the use of business language.

Merry L. Byrd, Virginia State University

Reading memoirs Persepolis, Reading Lolita in Tehran, Infidel, and Nomad against 'American' memoirs, including Lipstick Jihad, Burnt Bread and Chatney, Persian Girls, and Funny in Farsi, this paper demonstrates the "clash of cultures" creates an imbrication of identities working against simplistic definitions of the "other." These writers, caught between two cultures struggle to create a self-determining space despite cultural norms.

"Women in the World of Naguib Mahfouz"
Michael Francis McClure, Virginia State University

Naguib Mahfouz, Arab Nobel winner in literature, offers a 'canonical' view of Islamic culture in the modern world. His work challenges over-simplified images, and it offers a multi-layered, multivocal evocation of Islamic culture challenging overly facile defenses offered by western scholars of Islam (John L. Esposito, for example).

"Medieval Images of Women in 'Holy War'"
Donna Crawford, Virginia State University

Even in the Middle Ages, Islamic and Christian meet — and clash. This paper explores images of Middle Eastern and Christian women during the Middle Ages in both visual and written texts to question ways in which such texts observe and "colonize" the exotic other while at the same time suggesting underlying similarities in female codes of behavior and decorum.

Cultural Displacement and Aging in Amulya Malladi's The Sound of Language
Kay H. Heath, Georgia Gwinnett College

In this novel, Raihana escapes from Kabul to Denmark, where the language sounds "like the buzzing of a thousand bees" (3). Reminded of her uncle's hives, she finds a job harvesting honey for Gunnar, a recent widower. This friendship helps Raihana and Gunnar adjust to their new lives. However, Raihana's transgresses Islamic expectations of women's behavior, and the resulting censure by the Afgani community ends in violence. This paper examines the hive as a matriarchal nexus of healing revealed through Anam journal, offering resolution for Raihana's cultural displacement and Gunnar struggles with age.

Rituals of Healing: African American and Chicano/Latina Fiction Writers transforming Academic Spaces
Helane Adams Androne, Miami University of Ohio

I propose a paper that examines service as a common denominator among black women, expressed in literature (I'm thinking here of Bambara's Salt Eaters, June Jordan's poetry, black feminist essays, perhaps a memoir) and particularly as the results of service have been examined through the lenses of ritual and feminist medical ethics. Bambara's text specifically deals with the damage of balancing service to family, community and a nationalist agenda; Jordan's poetry presses us to consider how race and gender intersect to empower and damage our bodies and our rights. I plan to argue the ways that we come to know what we know: ethnic cultural memory explored in our literatures as testimonies that are, in fact, being taken ever more seriously by the healing community (journals such as Literature and Medicine as well as critics in the scientific community such as Ann Fowles Stanford who inquire as to how literature teaches us to handle the challenges of race and gender).

"On My Way to Doing Research: A Meta-Analysis of Political Scientists' Treatment of Black women"
Julia S. Jordan-Zachery, Providence College

This study provides a systematic and longitudinal analysis of the studies on Black women appearing in what are considered key political science journals over a twenty-year period. The analysis focuses not only on how such scholarship is included in these journals, but also critically assesses how said studies are conducted. Such a review is useful for analyzing the growth and placement of research on Black women. It also provides a synthesis of how Black women are being studied and portrayed—what methods are employed and what types of questions are being asked. This is helpful for future research efforts as it reveals areas of growth and those that remain underdeveloped.

I am Visible - You Choose Not to See Me: How to Situate Research on Black Women's Lived Socio-Political Experiences Within the Study of Black Politics
Claudia D. Nelson, Coppin State University

Discipline constraints on our scholarship to make visible the invisible often limits the recovery of vital data specific to understanding the lived experiences of African American women. Within political science, extensive/quantitative analysis is often preferred over intensive/qualitative analysis. It is paramount in situating research on the lived experiences of Black women to use mixed-methods in exploring, describing and analyzing their complex socio-political location. Within the context of this paper I will discuss the potential benefits of employing multiple qualitative research genres, such as phenomenological approaches, Black feminist theory and critical race theory, to the interdisciplinary scholarship on Black women.

Dismantling the Master’s House: Liberating Methodologies in the study of Black Women, Community and Drug Addiction
Dawn Hinton, Saginaw Valley State University; Tierra B. Tivis, Saginaw Valley State University

In order to disrupt the ‘majoritarian’ narrative (Solorzano & Yosso) of Black Women, then authors use Critical Race Feminism (Wing, Crenshaw, Solórzano & Yosso), Black Feminist Epistemology (Collins) and Indigenous Methodologies (Denzin, Lincoln & Smith) as lenses to examine community building and drug addiction. Oral narratives and story-telling are used to challenge existing biological and cultural deficit approaches. Work by the authors highlights the experiences of those who have been rendered invisible by traditional methodologies. Here, the authors discuss how they use transformative methodologies in the creation of knowledge about Black women.

PARTICIPANTS:
Tamara Michelle Beauboeuf, DePaul University

Jane Addams and Ida B. Wells-Barnett were contemporaries, colleagues in social reform, and writers who tackled the sexual exploitation of women. Drawing on their major works, I examine how both utilized the trope of the 'girl' - the most heterosexually vulnerable among women - to draw attention to aspects of the matrix of domination and its production of the 'ancient evil' and 'southern horror' of sexualized aggressions against young white and black women, respectively. In taking an intersectional approach to their works, I argue that white privilege remained a blind spot for Addams and a central structural reality for Wells, leading to their uneasy sisterhood.

Nuanced Meanings of Black Young Women's Sexuality:
Invisible Class Identities and Sexual Safety Activism
Kamila A. Alexander, University of Pennsylvania

Research about sex and expressions of young Black women's sexuality is often depicted as one-dimensional - associated with risk, danger, and unhealthy behaviors. This approach perpetuates beliefs about hypersexuality and fails to acknowledge influences of social locations. Consequently, sexual safety is narrowly conceptualized and promoted as avoidance of risk behaviors. This results in limited understanding about the varied ways in which young Black women manage sexual safety while meeting their needs for emotional love, trust, intimacy, and desire. Drawing from a heterogeneous sample of young black women, this presentation will examine the intersections of class identities with multiple strategies employed to maintain sexual safety.

"I Kissed a Girl and I Liked It": The Impact of (Hetero-) Sexualization on Sexual-Minority Girls
Elisabeth Morgan Thompson, University of Arizona

The APA Task Force on the Sexualization of Girls defined sexualization as emphasis placed on one's attractiveness/sexiness/sex appeal, and can occur culturally (media), interpersonally (partners, peers), and internally (self sexualization). To date, most sexualization research has focused primarily on the implications for (white, middle class) heterosexual girls. Drawing from data (from a phenomenological study of "girls kissing girls") and examples from popular culture, this presentation will highlight the sexual/bodily health and psychological/identity development implications that are specific to sexually minoritized girls growing up in a (hetero)sexist world that (over)sexualizes them.

"How to Save a Life: Coalitionary Literacy and the Meaning of Salvation"
Amanda Rossie, The Ohio State University

Stemming from a larger project that considers how conservative religious and political ideologies are narrated and taught through secular and popular texts, this paper focuses on the link of female sexuality to larger metanarratives about salvation. I want to consider how - using multiracial feminist theories of belonging, witnessing, and love - feminist scholars can begin to re-theorize salvation and build coalitions through literacy practices. I contend that this set of literacy skills has the potential to change the way we see coalition work and offer young women, in particular, a way to talk back to salvation narratives that them politically, socially, sexually and even spiritually damned.

PARTICIPANTS:
Battling Beauty: Re-Presenting Global REELalities in the Search for Self
Theresa Renee White, California State University, Northridge

This paper reflects data (clips of videotaped interviews/focus groups) collected for the development of a documentary that raises social awareness of globalized constructions of feminine beauty and identity, by exploring the roots and challenges of the beauty battles that women and girls struggle with worldwide. Setting personal narratives alongside commentary from psychologists and cultural critics, the film will explore the psychological issues girls and women face in their search for a positive sense of self in a world where females are constantly bombarded with the idea that maintaining a certain standard of beauty should be their primary goal.

Creative Interventions: Women Responding to Trauma
Alvina E. Quintana, University of Delaware

This paper focuses on two collections inspired by This Bridge Called My Back. Una Herida Por Otra and Shout Out introduce a variety of voices transcending boundaries, addressing inequality, violence and fear. Both exemplify feminist methods that carve a space for considering the impact of trauma within individual and global contexts. Both exemplify coalition building. Una Herida presenting cyberspace testimonios produced in the US and Mexico in response to 9/11, while Shout Out highlights violence against women of color.

Imagined Spaces for (Turkish) Women (of Germany): The Fictional Narratives of Alev Tekinay
Hulya Naclye Yilmaz, Penn State University

Fatih Akin's films situate Muslim women into the 19th century Europe's singular mold within the Turkish and Turkish-German contexts. His cinematic experimentation on 'the Turkish female' revives the orientalising representational discourse. Alev Tekinay's stories distinguish between differing contexts of women anywhere. The social and legal discrimination, abuse and oppression she depicts on Turkish women are universal. Her narrative intervention, thus, stresses the fact that any woman in any margin of the world can be subject to disempowering representations, from her home or host country, if she were to remain voiceless.
Korean Women in Visual Documentations: Suffering, Representation and Actuality
Miduk Kim, Independent Scholar
This paper aims to explore visual documentaries on Korean comfort women during the Pacific War (1910-1945) and Korean women in the sex trade in U.S. camp towns. By examining how the women and issues are presented in the documentary films, I explore knowledge production, ranging from the question of representation, the actual effect of the representation, and the witnessing (of the viewers).

From the popular "IRON JAWED ANGELS," to the dense and provocative "TOWER-HELD," our goal is to convene an open conversation, examine a "better practices" framework, and establish a clearinghouse through which we all can collaborate and share our ideas and experiences of using films in our classrooms.

147. Blogging as Feminist Activism
4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV

Making Feminism and Women Visible in Cyberspace
Brenda Bethman, University of Missouri, Kansas City

Currently, I use blogging in three ways: we use the Women’s Center blog to create a safe space for students and community members to learn about and discuss women’s and gender issues. I also use a group blog in my women’s literature class to extend our discussions beyond the classroom. Finally, I talk about editing a group blog featuring women higher education professionals using technology. What ties all of these blogs together is how they make feminism and women visible in cyberspace.

Building Community Through Blogging
Erin Stephens, Duke University

The Women’s Center started a women’s blog to amplify women’s experiences at Duke and to provide an interactive space for women to exchange experiences and ideas. A Women’s Studies/Public Policy class designed the blog with a focus on building community and promoting feminist critique and activism, with columns on personal experiences ("that’s what she says"), women’s leadership ("leadership profiles"), and current events on and off campus ("caught my eye"). The blog has successfully brought attention to women’s experiences at Duke, facilitated increased feminist identity among the bloggers, and it’s relationship to campus activism around gender issues.

Increasing Visibility Through Blogging
Lisa C. Salsbury, University of Idaho

Inspired by the success of online blogs published by Women’s Centers around the country, the University of Idaho Women’s Center started a blog of our own this semester. Four undergraduate students—an editor and 3 writers—are receiving internship credit through the School of Journalism and Mass Media to create and maintain the blog. All four students self-identify as feminists. I will discuss these young women’s experience of cyber activism, and discuss implications for increased visibility of and participation in our work on campus as a result of this new forum.

148. What Happens to Africana Studies If You Put Black Women’s Studies at the Center?
4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 2: Augusta
This panel considers the role women’s studies plays in theorizing race and ethnicity in Africana Studies programs, and how gender and/or feminist paradigms inform the pedagogical practices and professional experiences of black women who teach Africana Studies courses. Africana Studies, like Women’s Studies, has had to subvert the master’s tools in order to claim a humanity and insist upon a subjectivity that has not been extended to them. The panelists will discuss a range of questions and issues that think about the pedagogical and curricular strengths and limitations of teaching gender and sexuality in Africana Studies programs.

150. Campus Climate Assessments: Subverting "Master’s" Tools for Feminist Social Change
4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 1: Georgia 10
Many campuses engage in campus climate assessment projects in order to understand their institution’s unique challenges around issues of diversity and with the intention of making their institutions more welcoming and inclusive. As these surveys are typically designed to assess the wider population, what implications do these comprehensive assessments have specifically for women? This roundtable will explore several diverse campus experiences with developing and implementing comprehensive campus climate assessment and how issues affecting women’s voice, institutional sexism and privilege and resulting outcomes were addressed. Roundtable participants will have an opportunity to interact and discuss possible solutions.

Since 1972, Soroptimist has been helping women the world over reclaim their dreams through the Soroptimist Women’s Opportunity Awards program. This program provides cash grants to women who are working to overcome personal difficulties and improve their education, skills and employment prospects. The women may use the cash award to offset any costs associated with their efforts to attain higher education, including books, childcare and transportation.

Eligible applicants are women who:

- Provide the primary financial support for herself and her dependants
- Are enrolled in an undergraduate degree program or a vocational skills training program
- Have financial need

Guadalupe V. was a young wife trapped in a violent marriage, in a country that was not her own. A single mom to two children, Guadalupe eventually graduated from a Ph.D. program and has helped other women to leave abusive situations.

Peggy M. transformed her life from a single mom earning minimum wage at a fast food restaurant to a college graduate who makes her living as a professional speaker and published author.

Pachara Y., a domestic abuse survivor, found herself alone in a foreign country with three young children to support. She is learning to speak the language of her adopted land and plans to pursue a career in nursing.

Marina G. was a struggling single mom who ran in marathons and used the cash prizes to support her family. She recently obtained a degree in physical education.

The Past is the Present is the Future: The Natural Affinity of Feminism and Science Fiction
Ria D. Costello, McNeese State University
Feminist ideas, including the proposition that gender, sexuality, and even the body are social constructs, find a natural home in science fiction, in which everything is or can be constructed. Feminist ideas find purchase in terms of a robust critical lens, which is especially useful with a genre dominated in its "golden age" by male creators and consumers, and subject matter. Seminal texts—such as those from Marge Piercy and Ursula LeGuin—as well as mainstream authors—with a particular emphasis on award-winning Connie Willis—who writes with an embedded feminism that comes off as entirely non-didactic—will be addressed.

Subverting the Master's Hero: Malcolm Reynolds as Feminist
Laura L. Beadling, University of Wisconsin, Platteville
Much recent feminist scholarship has focused on the creation of strong female characters, but much less critical attention has been paid to male science fiction protagonists who espouse feminist ideals. Through close readings of several scenes, this paper is an attempt to remedy that lack as it examines JoJo Whedon's character Malcolm Reynolds, the ship's captain in the television show Firefly, as a feminist—despite his alpha male status—in terms of his respect for and equal treatment of female colleagues (and enemies), his acceptance of women as sexual beings, and his careful negotiation of sexual boundaries.

Representations of Sex and the Female Body: How Women Writers Use the Science Fiction Genre to Forward Social Awareness of Feminist Issues
Stacy Lynn Austin, McNeese State University
Feminist science fiction is concerned with issues of the body, sexuality, and gender roles, and makes these sensitive and often threatening issues approachable. Using science fiction, women writers are able to approach sensitive subjects in a non-threatening way. When people read about societies that are not their own, they are more willing to judge, examine, empathize with, and think about the important issues the work brings up without seeing the work as critical or propaganda. Once the issues are in readers' minds, they can draw their own parallels, allowing them to question their own world in an organic, self-induced way.

Feminists on Mars: Unveiling a Parallel by Alice Ilgenfritz
Jones and Ella Merchant
Mary M. Hughes, University of Louisiana, Lafayette
This paper will explore the late 19th century utopian feminist visioning of the novel Unveiling a Parallel which is ahead of its time in seeing the feminist potential for the science fiction genre as a space for argument and exploration of women's issues and in the novel's treatment of the science fiction genre through setting its action on another planet before the concept of space travel was a common science fiction mode.

Fat on Campus
Corey Stevens, Ohio University
In this article, I examine how sizeism is experienced by college students. Based on fourteen interviews with university students or recent graduates who identified as fat, overweight, or obese during their college career, this research reveals the social, institutional, and access issues that affect students of size in the university context. The analysis of gender shows the complex ways in which masculinity and femininity affect how the fat body is perceived within the university context. Additionally, several coping and resistance strategies that used by students of size are identified, and I suggest ways in which sizeism and fat discrimination can be addressed on college campuses both by activists and at the institutional level.

The Politics of Placement: Where Do Critical Fat Studies Belong and Who Decides?
Heather Brown, Northern Illinois University
There is an historical affinity between women's studies and critical fat studies, and many educators who are located in women's studies departments offer courses with a critical fat studies perspective. However, do critical fat studies courses belong solely in the women's studies department? Must they be affiliated with a "traditional" discipline, or can they stand as part of their own discipline? This talk will explore, using auto-ethnographic method, what happened when a first-year studies course with a critical fat studies perspective was proposed at liberal arts institution in the Chicago area. The resulting administrative and faculty uproar, rejection of the proposal, and subsequent placement of the proposed class in the women's studies department raises important questions about subjectivity, power, and the "sister outsider" status of critical fat studies scholars in the academy.

Towards a Theory of Embodied Racism: Developing a Framework to Explain the Experiences of Fat Women of Color
Nyaunu Stevens, University of Connecticut
Fat African American women often encounter contradictory messages about their bodies— their fat bodies are at once celebrated for being indicative of strength and endurance and simultaneously maligned for being unattractive examples of the racialized other. Thus, being a fat, African American woman necessarily results in an embodied experience which is unique. Such embodied knowledge affects how African American women live in their bodies as they navigate the social world. In this paper I develop a framework for articulating the experiences of fat women of color through a synthesis of Neo-Marxism, Black Feminist Thought. The experiences of African American women often become invisible in larger political discussions, and those of fat African American women are almost completely absent. This theory moves their experiences to the forefront of scholarly studies.

As Long as Fat Women are Oppressed, No Woman Can Be Liberated!": The Emergence of Fat Liberation in Early Second-Wave Feminism
Amy Erdman Farrell, Dickinson College
In this paper I propose to address the emergence and flowering of fat feminism in the early years of the second wave of feminism. I argue that second wave feminists inherited from the first wave of feminism a fraught relationship to the body, in particular to body size and to fatness; at the same time the ideology of the “personal is political” provided a counterpoint that allowed a new perspective to take hold. This paper, then, explores the early articulations of fat femenisms in second wave feminism. Through an exploration of these struggles I argue that one can see both the liberatory potential of a new fat politics and the vestiges of an older ideal of a thin body as “normal” and “civilized.”

153. Embodying Power and Powerful Embodiment: From Commedia Dell’arte to Performatve Activist Interventions

4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 1: Georgia 13

This workshop explores the performatvfe power of the female body: past, present and future. The first section reflects on past examples of how comedia actresses negotiated power on the stage. Next, a workshop builds on improvisation techniques from commedia dell’arte to playfully subvert social roles and power. Finally, the last section utilizes improvisation to prepare for future activist interventions in conflict situations, deploying performance to activate dialogue. Workshop leaders will weave together discourses from feminist comedy, comedia dell’arte, Alexander technique, improvisation, civic dialogue and nonviolent training to demonstrate how comic subversion and an authentic physical presence can transform power relations.

154. Feminist Transformations: Deploying Feminisms in Death and Dying

4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 1: Georgia 2

Participants:
- Carol Ann Cossehnk, Missouri State University

Feminists have ignored death. Scholars (e.g., Bordo, 1993; Grogan, 1999; Nettleton & Watson, 1998; Weitz, 1998) have rightly pointed at the vulnerability of our physical bodies to political vicissitudes and physical violence. The “dynamic developmental realities of actual human lives” are explicit (Callahan, 1995), and a hallmark of feminism as it appropriates and affirms the importance of concrete contexts and standpoints of embodiedness in any encounter. Interviewed daughters whose elderly mothers have died demonstrate the transformative power that the physical, embodied dying and death of a mother exerts on a daughter who is never too old to miss her mother.

Deploying Feminisms in Last Acts: A Feminist Approach to Death and Dying

Janet R. Hutchinson, Virginia Commonwealth University

As second wave feminists age, our last subversive act could be our own feminist death. As difficult as this is to think about, this last act is an important one for each of us, individually, and collectively particularly for those who live in states that deny partner relationships, some forms of palliative care, and death free from pain. This paper presents a frank discussion emphasizing issues of medicalization, treatment preferences, dementia, assisted death, and advance care planning from a feminist perspective. Supportive resources are proposed to advance the proposition of a feminist approach to death and dying.

Service learning classes encourage faculty and students to make the connections between feminist theories and concepts and the experiences of gendered populations within students’ surrounding communities. This paper explores service learning as applied feminism and a successful pedagogical tool in the women’s studies curriculum, and provides theoretical and logistical guidance for instructors seeking to expand student learning beyond classroom walls. I draw upon my experience teaching service learning courses unifying students with non-profit organizations devoted to women and gender issues. Such professional spaces offer students the opportunity to apply coursework in non-traditional ways and in service to others.

Healing Words: Women’s Studies in the Abortion Clinic

Jeanie Ludow, Eastern Illinois University

Imagine my delight when I discovered that several key texts from my Women’s Studies classes worked well in my second job at an abortion clinic. This paper describes the ways I used texts such as Ana Castillo’s “Extraordinary Woman” (1993) and Janet Campbell Hale’s “Alma” (1999) to ease abortion patients’ feelings of guilt and sadness and help them work toward a spiritually healthy abortion experience. The paper also explores ways pro-choice activists might use these and similar Women’s Studies texts to strengthen public arguments about abortion, particularly against those who stereotype abortion as a spiritually unhealthy act.

Our Classroom is the Big Sky and the Diverse Culture and Landscape of the US Desert Southwest

Gordene MacKenzie, Merrimack College

This paper discusses four student field trips taken to the US desert Southwest, focusing on the challenges and benefits and how to plan and fund such trips. Our classroom is the big sky, the diverse topography and culture in the Southwest US. Students learn from artists, writers, storytellers, environmentalists, and ranchers. The course combines Anzaldua’s border theories, Shiva’s ecofeminism, and Native American writing with multiple academic disciplines. Students visit Native American pueblos, the Dine’ reservation, and a 100,000 acre working ranch. Students learn firsthand about the history of colonization and about the current border struggles in the region.

156. Beyond Bodies: Reexamining Our Work in Campus Women's Centers

4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 1: Georgia 4

The work within our women's centers is changing. As budgets shrink and staffs get smaller, we find creative ways and new partnerships to accomplish our goals. As we embrace bystander intervention as a preferred form of violence prevention, we broaden the way we talk to students about what has historically been seen as a women's issue. As campus LGBT centers emerge and grow, we articulate how our work around gender and sexual identity relates to theirs. In this workshop, we urge new strategies for supporting women on campus while identifying areas of affinity that go beyond any single identity.

Mutilation, Spectacle and Rescue: Afghan Women in the Media
Shahnaz Khan, Wilfrid Laurier University

This paper locates works of feminist theorists who have identified First World constructs of the Third World woman as passive and oppressed by her culture and her men as helping to consolidate a case for war in Afghanistan where military intervention is in part posed as an attempt to rescue women. Drawing upon a recent Time Magazine cover of a mutilated Afghan woman, I argue that focusing on a spectacle of an un-historicized and dislocated Afghan woman helps support such rescues, endorses a case for war and makes it difficult for Afghan administration to guarantee women's human and citizenship rights.

Transnationalism Reversed: Engaging Religion, Development and Women's Organizing in Bangladesh
Elora Halim Chowdhury, University of Massachusetts, Boston

This paper situates women's activism in Bangladesh within the intersecting forces of religious extremism, transnational feminism, and global capitalist development. I seek to illuminate intra-movement tensions to theorize and imagine feminist alliances that are more equitable and just across borders of nation, class and community. At once complicit and transformative I look at the contradictory agendas women's groups are carving out and move beyond a dualistic framework that posits development and women's rights in opposition to religion and oppression to call for a critical analysis of transnational linkages and accountability on all sides in the struggle for feminist solidarity.

Women, Civil War, and Violent Resistance in Postcolonial Sri Lanka
Alka Kurian, University of Puget Sound, Washington

This paper problematizes the transformative potential of revolutionary violence for the subaltern consciousness and in particular for women. Focusing on the civil war in Sri Lanka, I maintain that Tamil women's participation in the LTTE (Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam) led to their disempowerment and undermined their agency. LTTE was structured around patriarchal ideology and practices that go against the meaning of women's revolutionary emancipation. I historicize colonized women's political beliefs and look at how women joining suicidal militant missions in situations where choosing the moment and circumstances of one's death becomes a source of empowerment and expression of agency.

158. Mothering and Hip Hop Culture: A Roundtable with the contributors

4:00 to 5:15 pm - Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV

Motherhood is an experience that is ever-present yet invisible in the musical genre of hip hop. Women's mothering experiences within the culture have garnered little attention from mainstream sources, with an observable silence within feminist/women's studies scholarship. We also lack any understanding of how mothers who are hip hop enthusiasts, negotiate their relationship to the culture with their children. Our roundtable asks, what are the discursive spaces that motherhood occupies in hip hop? How does motherhood complicate the hypermasculinity so dominant in the culture? How can we create, both locally and globally, an empowered and feminist hip hop mothering?

"Doing Hair is My Destiny': Mrs. Kim's Transnational Journey"
Seung-Kyung Kim, University of Maryland, College Park

The experience of immigrant women registers a broad range of diversity, as women who immigrate to the U.S. encounter a mix of opportunities and obstacles that combine with their backgrounds and individual qualities to produce unique life trajectories. Through the life story of sixty-five-year-old Mrs. Kim, this paper examines one constant factor in her life—doing hair—as an expression of her everyday agency. Her story reveals how women's work changes in the immigrant experience; how she negotiates the changing roles; the difficulties and tensions in this process; and how these processes lead to shifts in the construction of gender roles and expectations about women's work.

Working-Class Women's Art: A Life of Transnational Agency
yh Patt, University of Maryland

The life histories of ordinary transnational working-class women work as a kind of subaltern testimonio. Revealing the art of working-class life, this paper argues women craft lives with nuanced knowledge and sophisticated agency. For over two decades, Maria—a Salvadoran U.S. woman—has negotiated shifting class, raced, and gendered nation-state terrains. Many cultural biography points to the saliency of class and classism in contemporary life; the daily barriers and agency of domestic day workers; and, the potential feminist scholars have to challenge hegemonic narratives by writing co-constructed narratives with extraordinary ordinary working-class women.

The Story of a Feminist Life Through Her Art of Food
Jane E Dusselser, Iowa State University

Drawing on several life history interviews with Kim Phothisane, this paper explores the cultural meanings of food in a Laotian American context. Born in Laos during 1954, Phothisane left her country in the wake of the tumultuous post war years. Through all the struggles, joys, and challenges which comprise her life one element remains central, that of food. This woman's life guides me to the small, everyday acts of survival and reveals how displaced people carry culture with them during their taxing transnational journeys. Phothisane understands food as a canvas for expressing her worldview and nourishing bodies, minds, and souls.

162. Starting from Scratch: Building a Women's Leadership Program for Community Colleges

4:00 to 5:15 pm - Level 2: Savannah 1

As part of the celebration for Women's History month, Rose State College hosts an annual Women's Leadership Conference (WLC) every March. Wanting an event more enriching for the students than an annual luncheon to honor women's past achievements, the co-founders, Michelle Brockmeier and Monique Bruner, created this daylong symposium. In the last three years, with a new budget and generous administrative support, the WLC expanded dramatically. The two co-founders will present an overview of how they dealt with roadblocks and rewards in developing this conference and how to begin a similar program at other institutions.

4:00 to 5:15 pm - Level 2: Savannah 2

PARTICIPANTS:
An Overview of "Strong" Standpoint Methods
Sarah R. Robbins, Texas Christian University

This paper describes the application of Harding's framework in a mixed-method approach developed by an interdisciplinary research team examining the acculturation of international women faculty. The team enacted three dimensions of "Strong" standpoint work identified by Harding: 1) starting from the lives (interpreted as experiences, structural positions and/or discourses) of structurally exploited groups; 2) developing a group consciousness based in generating the information and insight oppressed groups need and seek (in this case, by promoting collaboration, solidarity, and reciprocal mentoring within the research team); and 3) aiming to identify the conceptual practices of power in some particular context.

In this case, US academic culture, by developing critiques of power relations and social interaction in an effort to effect change.
Intercultural Story-Telling
Seaine H. Smith, Kennesaw State University

Describing how the researchers affiliated their project with the feminist-oriented practice of life-narrative, this paper underscores how story-telling as feminist method grounded in standpoint recognizes the centrality of everyday life viewed through a reflective lens. As Sidonie Smith and Julia Watson have observed in “Reading Autobiography: A Guide for Interpreting Life Narratives” (2001 :6), life narrators use personal memories as “the primary archival source,” buttressed by evidence, “to support, supplement, or offer commentary on their idiosyncratic acts of remembering” (6) and to “address readers whom they want to persuade of their version of experience.” In merging methods of autobiographical work and discipline-based scholarship, our researchers engaged in a form of self-(re)construction as academicians. In the wake of such “bridging” work, as is the outcome of this project, individual identities (in this case, researchers) are transformed to populate an intersectional space that connects formerly distinct and different cultures (in this case, discipline-based methodology and scholarship). In this alternative space, residents demonstrate “intercultural citizenship” (Byram, 2008) as the aspirational value. Arguably, an intentionally feminist stance forms an important role in the process.

Collaboration and Interactive Mentoring
Federica Santini, Kennesaw State University

This presentation describes the research team’s use of collaboration and reciprocal mentoring as methods for addressing Harding’s “strong” standpoint framework by developing a “group consciousness” based in generating “the information and insight oppressed groups need and seek,” and by aiming “to identify the conceptually practices of power in some particular context,” in this case US academic culture. The team drew on models such as a Forum published in Tulsa Studies in Women’s Literature in 1994 and a recent study of positioning theory in global feminist collaborations (deVelaz, Trice, and Ofreneo, "Positioning in global feminist critical collaboration," 2006). The project’s essay collection utilizes collaborative feedback and informal peer review in the writing and revision process via “status check” mentor-mentee and whole-group sessions, enabling team members to situate their individual memoirs within larger, cross-disciplinary conversations and in dialogue with multiple research traditions. At the mid-way point in the research, team members had developed sufficient trust to mentor each other’s thinking and writing reciprocally, and they also held a focus group conversation to create a record of progress and ongoing questions. Upon completion of the core chapters, five respondents offered commentaries and critical analyses from additional academic perspectives, including those of a graduate student and a male faculty member who taught overseas at an all-women’s institution.

Intersectionality, Multivocality and Power Critique
Gertrude Tinker Sachs, Georgia State University

This presentation describes the ongoing work of one small group within the larger research team, teacher educators at an urban public research institution. Using dialogic, reflexive inquiry, this group has regularly reflected together on their teaching, research, service, and professional development as international faculty women learning to navigate the power structures of US academic culture. Focusing on intersectionality, these womanist scholars have drawn on post-colonial theory to interrogate themselves, thereby theorizing their lived experiences, contesting the status quo in the academy, and envisioning their own potential contributions to the education of teachers in the United States. Highlighting their unique existence is at the crossroads of national, political, colonial, post-colonial, gender, and many more contested spaces, they have produced multi-vocal writing engaged in what Layli Phillips calls “womanist methods of social transformation.”

Gender in the Corporate Academy: A Qualitative Assessment of Disparities
Kathryn Coffey, State University of New York, Cortland; Holly S Fodge, Southern Illinois University
Utilizing the framework of gendered organizations in order to examine how faculty have adapted to or resisted participation in gendering within the academic institution, this qualitative study employed the use of focus groups of faculty members of a medium sized state university college in the northeast. Topics of discussion included service and committee work, teaching and research, informal advisement, home life and how it effects career advancement and the tenure process. Participants described experiences which perpetuate this organizational patriarchy which suggests a call to women to advocate for serious changes in organizational structure.

Navigating my "Tight Spaces": Breaking Bread with Audre Lorde, a Critical Discourse Analysis of Sister Outsider
Shawn Arango Ricks, Winston-Salem State University
This paper attempts to "make sense" of how I, and other Black Feminist Scholars, negotiate power, navigate oppression, and resist domination while dismantling the institutional structures of the academy in order to engage in liberatory practices. Utilizing Critical Race Theory, Critical Race Feminism, and Critical Discourse Analysis, I conducted a secondary and textual analysis of Sister Outsider (2007) by Audre Lorde. The results of which produced a dialogue with Lorde that generates a framework to successfully negotiate the multiple marginalizations (tight spaces) within hegemonic institutions of domination — the academy.

The Politics of Selling In: Black Women Reimagining Space and Transforming Tragedy in Newark, NJ
Zenzele Iseke, University of Minnesota
How do identity, memory, and affect shape the ways black women resist the non-crises of the destruction and containment of black life in U.S. cities? In response to this question, I offer a portrait of black womanhood that combines the self-told poetics of activists with Newark's fraught cartographic history. Using the personal narratives of twenty-nine activists, I explore how black women transform personal and transpersonal tragedy into community resistance. Black women "sell in" by sacrificing extraordinary amounts of time, effort, and relationship-building to form community spaces that foster a positive and stable sense of black female and queer identities.

The "Double Outsider's" Challenges to Professional Success: Implications for Black Women's Leadership
Keisha Edwards Tassie, Clayton State University
"Despite significant progress in the socioeconomic status of working women and minorities, data analyses at the city, state, national, and cross-national levels continue to document race and gender inequalities in workplace power" (Elliott & Smith, 2004). Three broad mechanisms explain ascriptive inequalities in the workplace: direct discrimination, exclusion of women and minorities, and ascriptive dissimilarity with supervisors who oversee higher positions of power. In all three cases, Black women are marginalized as a result of their "double outsider" position as Black and female. We offer this research as a significant contribution to the discourse regarding Black women and leadership.

This paper reads the early coverage of AIDS by two "gay" newspapers, The New York Native and the Gay Community News. I argue that in the 1980s "gay" journalists trying to explain a terrifying, new disease and the simultaneous rise of the anti-gay, anti-abortion "moral majority" developed a "queer epistemology of abortion." An implicit analogy -- "AIDS is to gay men what losing the right to abortion is to women" -- governs early "gay" reporting. I analyze the operation of this premise and conclude that feminist and queer analyses have overlooked an epistemological alliance which it is now time to reclaim.

A Visual Rhetoric of Racial Vulnerability: Young Women of Color, Conservative Media Campaigns and Hyper-reproduction
Kathryn Oliviero, Emory University

New social movements call upon racist population control legacies, young women of color's precariousness, and children's vulnerability to displace socioeconomic anxieties and revitalize new racisms. Campaigns against abortion and same-sex marriage claiming to center difference are considered, including: the Radiance Foundation's billboards equating abortion with black genocide; Proposition 8 online media featuring testimony from young women of color to argue same-sex marriage threatens their moral health and racial integrity. The figures of the teenage woman of color and the African American fetus ventriloquize through the placeholder of the vulnerable child religious and racialized morals about sexual chastity and irresponsible reproduction.

Critical Ethnic, Feminist, and Queer Studies in a time of Crisis / Rupture / Repetition / Amnesia
Tamara L. Spira, University of California, Davis; Heather M. Turcotte, University of Connecticut

There was a time when we could say there was such thing as a feminist revolution. Now, however, that moment is considered nostalgic, co-opted, and at best, unfinished. This collective paper asks the seemingly simple question: What has happened within feminist studies and movements that has made it near impossible to imagine, utter and live revolution? Grounded in legacies, present and futures of multiple anti-racist, post-/anti-colonial and "intersectional" feminist genealogies, we explore legacies and current strategies of epistemic destabilization, interdisciplinarity orientation, and institutionalization that enabled ethnic, area, and feminist studies through the building of radical trust and political necessity.

Historicizing African-American Perspectives on Abortion: Connecting Research and Activist Praxis
Cynthia R. Greenelee-Donnell, Duke University

Anti-abortion forces have effectively marshaled the past to sway hearts and minds. They correctly cite the impact of race-based eugenics and population control in the history of abortion in black communities, but link abortion to lynching and civil rights in profoundly ahistorical ways. The selective history of anti-abortion partisans is not borne out by overlapping histories of reproductive health and rights organizing. This presentation will give participants 1) accurate information based on my historical research findings on abortion in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and 2) concrete tools to research abortion history in their own communities.

Towards a Queer Feminist Epistemology: Abortion in and Gay Media in the Age of AIDS
Karen M. Booth, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

From "Mamma Grizzlies" to Madonna: Neonoliberal Motherhood in Relation to Feminist Antimilitarist Activism
Mary Jo Klinker, Washington State University

Examining Sarah Palin's "Mamma Grizzlies" political discourse and Madonna and Angelina Jolie's transnational adoptions as acts of humanitarianism, I argue that contemporary motherhood plays greatly into the hegemonic reformulation of women's bodies as bearers of the nation. This poses new obstacles to feminist antimilitarist activist groups who have built upon the strong history of mothers' anti-war stances in the public sphere.

An Ethics of (M)othering: Abjection, Affectivity, and Love in Kristeva and Irigaray
Matthew Ray Stewart, Simmons College

I philosophically explore the ethical significance and narrative of (m)othering in the work of Kristeva and Irigaray to emphasize the performative embodiment of mothering as affective, corporeal, and ethical. Through a critical reinterpretation of Lacanian psychoanalysis, I reopen a discussion of the affective and ethical threshold that appears for subjectivity through (m)othering—specifically through intersubjective processes of compulsory abjection, affective proximity, and transerential love. Following Levinas to Kristeva and Irigaray, I account for the face-of-the-(m)other as the ethical call of responsibility for the 'other' such that it is the face-of-the-(m)other that transitions the subject-in-process into spaces of alterity and otherness.
Toward a Politics of Unintelligibility: Transgender as Transgression

A. Rez Pullen, Emory University

This paper reformulates definitions of "transgender" through Foucault's and Bataille's writings on transgression. In so doing, it examines the relationship between embodiment and "intelligibility," arguing that the transgender body prior to its being labeled as such, highlights not only the inadequacies of the labels "male" and "female" but also forces us to consider what Butler deems a certain "corporeal excess" that cannot be accounted for through discursive protocols. This paper uses Foucault, Bataille and Butler to examine two contemporary legal court cases, highlighting the complex relationship between transgender bodies, legal structures, and discourses of cultural intelligibility.

Intersex Activism, Medical "Normalization," and Human Rights in a Transnational Frame

David A. Rubin, Vanderbilt University

This paper explores the genealogy of intersex activism, asking how the uneven transnational development of contemporary intersex human rights discourse transforms current understandings of gender variance. Analyzing San Francisco Human Rights Commission's 2005 report "A Human Right Investigation into the Medical 'Normalization' of Intersex People" and, to this date, the only report by an official US agency to suggest that the standard medical approach to intersex conditions leads pediatric specialists to violate their patients' human rights—I ask: how does the declaration of intersex peoples' human rights reconfigure the relationship between gender variance and personhood?

Stylized Genders, Anticipated Bodies: Trans-masculinity in Original Plumbing

Mairead Sullivan, Emory University

This paper analyzes two recent publications of Original Plumbing (OP), a quarterly magazine dedicated to FTM culture. I trace an articulation of trans-subjectivity through Butler's theory of performativity and also explore how transgender transgression both supports and reworks Butler's theories. Referencing the variant body morphologies documented and articulated in OP, I describe extraordinary conceptualizations of sex and gender that dispute a categorical reference to specific body morphologies. Ultimately, I argue that the trans narratives put forth in OP provide a critical cultural reference for contemporary feminisms seeking to expand and expound a radical discourse of gender and materiality.

Service-Learning In and Out of the Women's Studies Classroom

Susan Stiritz, Washington University

My paper, the first of four in our panel, has three parts. The first section will outline the steps we took to institute our service-learning revolution and will include descriptions of contributions made by our university's social work school and of the series of workshops a colleague and I developed to introduce service-learning to our colleagues. The second section analyzes the results of an empirical study I conducted of my own teaching in 2010, discussing limitations I found in my classroom, which, I believe, service-learning can correct. Third, I outline my own service-learning curriculum.
"Contemporary Female Sexualities: Designing Sex Education." I conclude by discussing how helping students perceive unearned privilege as the flip side of structural oppression prepares them to become lifelong upholders of egalitarian values, democracy, and global peace—task especially difficult but especially crucial during times of creeping authoritarianism.

"Service-Learning: Working with Students in the Classroom and at a Local Domestic Violence Shelter"
Jami Ake, Washington University
As an indispensable pedagogical approach for feminist studies, service-learning equips students to think—and to act—across the inevitable discrepancies that emerge between feminist theory and feminist practice in the world outside the classroom. Energetically engaging the theory-practice divide is essential as we prepare students for professions (where they can continually interrogate and re-imagine the systems they encounter) and to pursue feminist research (where they can ask new, experience-informed and socially useful questions of their scholarly fields). In partnering with local domestic violence agencies, our "Projects in Domestic Violence" course has helped students navigate this theory-practice divide and successfully transition to positions as feminist practitioners and scholars.

"Developing a Girls' Studies Service Learning Course."
Amy Eisen Cislo, Washington University in St. Louis
Since 2012 marks the 100th anniversary of Girl Scouts of America it seemed an appropriate time to introduce a course focusing exclusively on girls. My presentation goes over the process of course development that incorporates community organizations in the learning process. I will explain how to prepare for meetings with local organizations and how to integrate classroom material with the students' volunteer work in the organizations. For those wishing to develop an introductory Girls' Studies course, my talk and handouts will provide topics and reading suggestions that target the intersection of ethnicity, class and religion in understanding girlhood in American culture.

Service Learning: A Student's Perspective
Shaina Goodman, Washington University
My formal experience with service-learning consists of a course focused on domestic violence, yet much of my education in Women's Studies, social work, and the law is influenced by service-learning concepts. Service-learning has been instrumental in my knowledge development insofar as it has taught me the importance of understanding the connection between academia and practice. This integrated approach to learning has made me a stronger critical thinker and a more effective advocate. It has also directly influenced my pursuit of a career in domestic violence policy work, a field that values the interrelationship between feminist scholarship and lived experience.

The Power of the Imagination-Intellect in Feminist Research
Susan Iverson, Kent State University
The feminist researcher serves as instrument of the research process, and is called to acknowledge and "bracket" oneself. This "subjectivity audit" or "turning" of self (Peshkin, 1988) sustains a distrust of subjective experience in the research process, and contributes to critique of critical or feminist studies as inherently biased. I argue that the researcher's experience and creative self—what Weems (2003) calls the imagination-intellect—must be cultivated and deployed, to contest dominant (objective) conceptions of the knowledge-production process. The aesthetic, creative, expressive, and dramatic invites ontological opportunities to blur the boundaries between artist and scholar, between 'performing' and 'doing' research.

The Garden Path to Social Justice: Creative Non-Fiction as Site of Feminist Theorizing and Discursive Activism
Susan C. Cumings, Georgia College & State University
While bringing women's voices, and later the voices of multiply marginalized women, out of silence is a principle of feminist work, Zimmerman and others have criticized a tendency of feminist first person accounts to view articulating and celebrating diverse identities as an end in itself. Drawing on autotheoretical frameworks (Young), and theories of non-fiction (Root, Dillard, Steinberg) as a form whose mission is to "take you somewhere" and "lead to new discovery/insight," this presentation will give examples of and probe methodologies for using the "real world language" of creative non-fiction as a vehicle for feminist theorizing and discursive activism.

Autobiography and Autoethnography: Mixing Narrative Methods for Mixed Race Research
Jessie Turner, University of California, Santa Barbara
This paper explores the relationship between, and strategic blending of, feminist of color traditions of "talking back" (hooks, 1989) through "theories in the flesh" (Moraga, 1981) and newer, more formalized methodological developments of autoethnography originating from Anthropology's crisis in representation. This conscious hybridization of autobiographic and autoethnographic frameworks facilitates the storying of self in investigating multiraciality, itself marginalized by "master's tools" still in play in Ethnic Studies and wider society.

Partnering to Support Local Teen Moms
Deborah L. Byrd, Lafayette College
In this presentation/paper a tenured women's studies professor considers her partnership with the director of a small feminist non-profit agency as they work together to sustain and strengthen a mentoring program for pregnant and parenting teens at their city's large public high school. She will identify both the challenges and rewards of this partnership, especially in regards to issues of social class. "Many in our community still view the students and faculty at 'the college on the hill' as wealthy elitists who are indifferent to the well-being of a primarily working class community. And even when they know that a partnership might be possible, people who run non-profits often don't know who to contact."

We Meet Again: Academic and Activist Roots of Feminist Fat Studies
Linda Garber, Santa Clara University
This presentation/paper focuses on the lifelong connection between a lesbian studies scholar and a feminist fat activist, exploring the convergence of their work and commitments related to body-size politics. The presentation will describe the contrasting contexts and formats for their work, as well as the differences in their discourses and approaches. In particular, questions will be raised as to what "counts" as activism, and how to bring that activism into the classroom: "As a women's studies professor I want to be teaching students how to organize and how to be activists by introducing them to people who are doing this work."

Never Ending Questions: The Politics of Self-Critique
Astrid Henry, Grinnell College
In this presentation/paper a women's studies professor will share insights from her conversation with a recent women's studies graduate from her small liberal arts college. She will consider some of the generational and ideological shifts that have occurred within their shared field of Women's Studies, and emphasize questions of what activism means to the current generation of women's studies graduates, including her student's belief that: "Today's feminist activism is less visible, partly because it's changing form. . .. We benefit from greater classroom attention to intersections among sex, gender, race, age, and ability: These intersections sometimes make our activism less quantifiable."

The Relevance of Women's Studies to Student Internships in Women's/Feminist Organizations
Karen Dugger, Towson University
This presentation/paper explores the interaction between what students learn in the women's studies classroom and interning for women's organizations. It draws on the distinction made between women's and feminist organizations, with the latter distinguished by having gender equality as the end of women's subordination as an explicit objective. The presenter will summarize her conversation with two graduate students who experienced these distinctions first-hand— one who interned for a nationally recognized feminist advocacy organization and the other who interned for an NGO targeting "at-risk girls." Key questions will include: How do the goals of different women's organizations reflect or complicate what is being taught about feminism in the academy? How do interns understand and navigate these differences?

Performing Global Feminism: "Seven" from Page to Stage
Beth Widmaier Capo, Illinois College
How can theatre embody feminist activism? When is staged performance a feminist practice? This paper will address these questions by analyzing a faculty staged reading of the documentary play Seven by Paula Cizmar. Two performances on a liberal arts campus, Fall 2010 and Fall 2011, will be placed in the context of the play itself before being discussed in light of feminist theories of performance, global women's issues, and education (the play was staged Fall 2011 as part of a first-year experience centered on Half the Sky by Kristof and WuDunn and global women's issues).

Staging Zora Neale Hurston
April S. Pelt, University of Delaware
In "Staging Zora Neale Hurston," I contend that academy-centric accounts of Hurston's "recuperation" overlook the roles that black feminist playwrights and actors have played in Hurston's feminist iconization. By recovering and historicizing their contributions to Hurston's legacy, I demonstrate how plays and one-woman shows have used Hurston as a mirror to reflect the changing politics of race and class within feminist movements during the past three decades.

Womanist Theatre: A Staged Resistance
Tracey Coretta Ferdinand, Clark Atlanta University
This paper explores the creative ways in which black women playwrights such as Alice Childress and Ntozake Shange have used the theatre to engage and challenge the ways in which the experiences of everyday women have been portrayed and understood. In particular, the paper places in conversation the specific texts of scholars Valéria Watkins, Laili Phillips and Augusto Boal. The paper seeks to uncover how Black women playwrights have used theatre to engage social justice, social change and knowledge production using a womanist theoretical framework. It also explores how theatre can be used to address social issues affecting Black women today.

178. A Breach in the Wall? Teaching Women's and Gender Studies through a Transnational Lens
5:25 to 6:40 pm • Level 1: Georgia 3

This roundtable brings together a diverse group of interdisciplinary scholars to address the challenges and possibilities of teaching transnational feminisms in women's and gender studies programs. The panel presentations address the following questions: What is transnational feminism? How do we create courses that address gender and globalization without reproducing colonial feminist dynamics? How do we effectively teach transnational feminist practice(s)? Roundtable presenters will speak to these questions based on experience at a range of academic institutions. The session will allow ample time for discussion.

2.5 Children, a Dog and a Camioneta? Queer Women Negotiating Intimacy in Mexico City
Anahí Russo Grijalva, Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey

After repetitive economic crisis, Mexico City's inhabitants have had to negotiate various living arrangements. This paper examines how women who participate in queer spaces are negotiating intimacy (love, friendship and hanging out) in their living spaces. I suggest that the social organization of these precarious arrangements is in tension with the ideal of monogamous couples' cohabitation, an image that has become prevalent after the passage of a reform on marriage that became effective in 2010 in Mexico City and includes same-sex couples. This study is based on ethnographic work conducted in 2009-2010.
All Aboard! ‘Love Trains’, ‘Underground Railroads’ and Systems of Global Apartheid

Melissa Autumn White, Syracuse University

This paper critically examines the ‘border technologies’ of love and intimacy in contexts of global apartheid. I argue that state (r/e)valuations of affective attachments, framed as ‘humanitarian’ responses to ‘crises’, profoundly structure mobility and nationalized residency rights whilst citizenship and migration status increasingly mediate the distinction between ‘livable lives’ and ‘slow deaths’. I bring into tension US and Canadian foreign policy responses to Haiti’s 2010 earthquake (promises to expedite in-process adoptions of Haitian children; fast-tracking family immigration sponsorships of Haitian nationals) with both countries’ treatment of Iranian queer refugee claimants to explore the geopolitics of intimate migration economies.

The Beauty of State Construction: Crisis Resolution through Pageantry in Contemporary Colombia

Stacey Leigh Hunt, Auburn University

I explore the role of beauty pageants in the ongoing and inter-related processes of state and citizen construction in Colombia. Pageantry plays a key role in creating state authority, particularly in moments of extended crisis, by relying on familiar tropes of gender and sexuality. Beauty contests strengthen and re-legitimize the state by successfully (re)articulating a national identity based on heterosexuality complementarity while providing a forum for the construction of state institutions ranging from physical infrastructure to the economy. This ethnography of governance lends to our understanding of the role of gendered spectacle in state construction in Colombia and beyond.

Digitizing Girlhood: Feminist Methodological Insights into Girls’ Gendered, Racial, and Sexual Subjectivities Online
Adriane Brown, The Ohio State University

Feminist media scholars’ insistence on amplifying girls’ voices is essential to decolonizing scholarship on girlhood. Yet, it is essential to consider the ways that girls’ digital self-presentation is often positioned in normative femininity, whiteness, and heterosexuality—even girls who do not occupy these categories. I analyze feminist research on girls’ digital activities and discuss how my own research methods—visual and textual analyses of websites, instant messenger interviews with girls, and a research blog—have yielded nuanced and often contradictory results that reveal the complex nature of girls’ gendered, racial and sexual subjectivities in digital spaces.

Everything I Learned While You Were in Kindergarten is Illegal: Focusing on the Knowledge Homeless Youth and Drug Users Cultivate and Share
Meg Panichelli, Solace Crisis Treatment Center; Jessie C Workman, Youth Emergency Shelter

This paper employs intersectionality to discuss the skills and knowledge produced by female-identified drug users and youth living in emergency shelters. Our dialogue examines the disparity between skills that are deemed important to success in U.S. society and skills that are relevant to individuals in their daily context. For example, who decides that it is more important for a person to learn how to balance a checkbook than to temporarily reverse a heroin overdose? Additionally we reflect on what it means to be white, queer, and feminist identified in our work with drug users and youth of color.

“Muchachas Michoacanas: Portraits of Adolescent Girls in a Transitory Town”

Lila Soto, University of Wyoming

In this study, I focus on competing narratives of nationhood, U.S. popular culture, and immigration that shape the lives of Mexican teenage girls in a rural town in Michoacan, Mexico. Based on forty interviews conducted in 2010 with such group, this paper examines how they respond to both, U.S. symbols that enwrap the possibilities of migration and Mexican national campaigns, which promote Mexican citizenship and patriotism as viewed in the main television channels of Mexico. The impact this has on their daily lives and how they respond to such competing narratives are at the center of this paper.

Feminist Methodology of the Colorado Project
Annjanette Alejano-Steele, Metropolitan State College of Denver

The Colorado Project applies the basic feminist goal to challenge and change women’s subordination to men to our work in the anti-human trafficking movement. We extend that goal beyond a binary understanding of women and men, understanding that certain groups of men can be subordinate to certain groups of women, due to the fact that gender intersects with race, class, nationality, sexuality and other identities, to reinforce systems of power and oppression. This paper will review the feminist methodology central to the Colorado Project, including qualitative and quantitative tools and approaches informed by a national advisory board and project stakeholders.

Transformative Communications and Social Change: A feminist approach
Yndia Lorick-Wilmot, PhD, The FrameWorks Institute

This proposal explores the underlying social commitment Women’s Studies scholars ask of their work to transform the invisibility and inequity in women’s lives. In examining Women’s Studies, as a discipline rooted in challenging established systems of knowledge that rests on socio-structural power arrangements, the author argues that feminism’s appeal to the mainstream public is obscured by periods of the conservatism of its language in a way that represses its ability to transform thinking and support agency. By looking to the effectiveness of various knowledge producing formats, Women’s Studies scholars can be better catalysts for effectuating broader social change.
Women’s Studies: Activism and Academia
Kate Parsons, Webster University
As Women’s Studies programs become increasingly institutionalized in colleges and universities, comfort levels with activism and/or advocacy as programmatic goals may decrease. In this essay I explore several different ways to conceive of “scholarship” and “activism,” and argue that feminist academics ought to resist institutional pressures to exclude the latter. To deny activism or advocacy as part of program goals and learning outcomes risks further entrenching the power structures feminists aim to subvert. My paper aims to narrow perceived gaps between scholarly and activist programmatic pursuits, without denying that there are some differences between them.

Curriculum Transformation for Making STEM Culture Visible
Linda C. Fuselier, Minnesota State University, Moorhead
Changing the culture that our students experience in STEM majors involves cross-disciplinary collaboration and persistence and encounters with resistance. In Fall 2009, the Women’s Studies Program launched a certificate program for Women and Science with the goal (a) enhancing the understanding of science among humanities majors, (b) encouraging our WS students to view themselves as collaborators and contributors to the sciences through feminist critique, and (c) development of a richer understanding of science as socially and politically located among science majors. I will present an evaluation of the first year of our certificate program.

Discussing the Master’s Tools: Bringing Inclusive Science into the Science Classroom
Claudia Murphy, Minnesota State University, Moorhead
What are some pedagogical tools and techniques for persuading scientists and students of science that the STEM disciplines are socially and politically located among science majors. I will present an autobiographical sketch lending the student voice to feminist critique, and whether it is possible to queer motherhood.

Perspectives from a Major in Biosciences and Minor in Women’s Studies
Deepa Trivedi, Minnesota State University, Moorhead
I will present an autobiographical sketch lending the student voice to experiences of women undergraduates in science at a regional university. Participation in the Women’s Studies minor and the Women and Science certificate program has provided me with an alternative perspective on my science major and career path. Feminist analyses of science encountered in my Inclusive Science course (and others throughout WS) were instrumental in encouraging me to know and respect my standpoint and use it as an advantage in science. I will relate my change in perspective to opportunities to change the culture in science at undergraduate institutions.

Subverting the Master’s Tools: Queering Immigration Discourse
Mignonette Chiu, Columbia University
Arguments against immigration often appeal to highly gendered discourses that reproduce normative gender roles and constructs about family, which feminists have attempted to deconstruct. Intersectional and queer feminist approaches employed an analysis of race, sexuality and nationality, which complicated the study of immigration by first expanding to include women and later evolved into discussions that analyzed and critiqued gendered and heterosexual norms. However, these liberal arguments for immigration still borrow heavily from normative frameworks. By analyzing immigration-related documentaries, I will discuss how critiques of normative frameworks (intersectional and queer) inform immigration studies.

Beyond the Norms: An Inquiry into the Queering of Motherhood
Lacey Story, Eastern Michigan University
I explore the ways in which queer methodology can be used to look at how women in feminist, lesbian and queer movements are thinking, discussing and approaching motherhood. A queer theory is becoming an important method in critiquing current culture, I argue that it can offer insights into new ways that those who identify as feminist, lesbian, and queer are more deliberate ways to parent their children. I explore the ways feminist, lesbian, and queer parenting philosophies differ from cultural norms and whether it is possible to queer motherhood.

Queering Normative Femininities?: CODEPINK’s Disruptive Deployments

An Exploration Inside the Issues
Donna Taylor, University College London
The APSA offers minority-based initiatives toward increasing the involvement of African-American students. Many institutions of high learning, however, do not offer coursework aimed at African-Americans, and for those who indeed do so, the courses may be limited. If female A.A. students are seeking a representative to model themselves after, 67.1% of professors are white males, 16.8% are white women, with African-American professors making up exactly 6%, with black women at 3.2% and black men at 2.8 percent. Though the Princeton Review (n.d.) cites Political Science as the ninth most popular major overall, there is a disconnect in attracting African-American students.

Making Sense of Success: Women Sociologists and their Experiences in Academia
Kristin Marsh, University of Mary Washington
This study examines the ways accomplished women sociologists talk about their careers: the decisions made along the way; the environments in which they were schooled and have worked; and their experiences navigating work and family. Unstructured in-depth interviews with 25 women reveal a variety of experiences. These stories show the continuing challenges of differential treatment based on gender, race, class, sexuality and age. Issues of inclusion are also about hierarchies regarding theory and method. Having succeeded according to institutional arrangements established prior to their arrival, these women express commitment to an increasingly supportive environment for newer colleagues and graduate students.

Subverting Traditional Histories with Women’s Work: Help from and for the Discipline of Philosophy
Sarah Katherine Tyson, Vanderbilt University
Feminists reclaiming the writing of women in the history of philosophy often describe their work as transformative. Within these projects, however, we can also often see the reiteration of traditional philosophical standards. Reliance on those standards, I argue, undercuts the transformative potential of reclamation. Instead, we must put into question the standards by which we deem work philosophical. I argue that Michele LeDoeuff, a theorist of women’s exclusion from philosophy, provides a powerful model for doing so. I recommend it as a much-needed resource for reclamation, not just in philosophy, but also for traditionally male-dominated disciplines across the academy.

Anna Krenz's project is an on-line website engaging critically with the commodification of Eastern European women, their bodies and their labor, within the geo-political context of the New Europe. I analyze the project from a formal, contextual and affect theory perspective. I show how Anna Krenz's visual representation strategies subvert and challenge the objectification of women's bodies at work within such contexts.

The Story of the Atis of Matènwa: Haitian Women Shaping Their Destiny in Post-Earthquake Haiti
Allie Marie Jones, Claremont School of Theology
This paper will look at the Atis of Matènwa, a creative grassroots organization that allows Haitian women living in the rural village to chart their own destiny. The Atis of Matènwa, have used women's artistic skills in Haiti to establish a sustainable program where women sell their artwork in Haiti and abroad. The steady income allows the women to reinvest and shape their destiny. As Haiti recovers from one of the worst natural disasters in history it is important to remember the Atis of Matènwa and the success they have had because they listened to the voices of Haitian women.

Scream Like a Girl: Young Women, Girls, and Today’s Activism
Allison Marie Albright, State University of New York, Buffalo
Current rhetoric on social movements indicates that activist projects have become institutionalized and shaped by professionalism (Meyer & Tarrow, 1998). Have structured political interest groups shaped protest and political activism? If so, what has happened to girls grassroots activism for girls? This paper will look at the social movements, protests, and activism of young women and girls today in the Americas to argue that grassroots activism is kept alive and well when they add their own passionate voices to counter conservative political thought. Work from Rebel Girls: Young Activism and Social Change Across the Americas, Leading the Way: Young Women’s Activism for Social Change, and Do It Anyway. The New Generation of Activists will be incorporated into this paper to show that young women and girls are still “screaming like a girl” to get their voices, thoughts, beliefs, hopes, and dreams out through protest and activist projects to influence social change.

“Paving the Way …! Girl Scout Cookie Power!”: Empowerment, Emotion, and Affect in the Girl Scout Cookie Sales
Denise Dixon Goerisch, San Diego State University
The annual Girl Scout cookie sales in the US seek to empower girls to become women of “courage, confidence and character” through the development of essential business and leadership skills. However, this mission of empowerment is complicated by the sales’ relationship to forms of market capitalism that exploit young girls’ affectations and customers’ emotions. Drawing upon mixed qualitative methods and emotional geographies scholarship, this paper investigates the conflicting message of girl empowerment and exploitation of girls’ identities within the context of the cookie sales in southern California.

From Girls to Young Women: Reflections on A Longitudinal PAR Project
Britney G. Brinkman, Chatham University
This presentation will involve reflections from an 8-year longitudinal research project (finishing in spring 2012) designed to increase resiliency among girls, teach girls about social justice, and examine the factors which impact girls’ development. As a co-investigator, I will share some of the lessons we have learned as well as the challenges we faced in implementing an action research project with a small group of girls over 8 years. In particular, I will discuss the ways in which the girls moved from being research “participants” to “collaborators” and plans for future programming and research.

Refugee Girls Narrating Citizenship, Negotiating Discourses of Othering
Laura R. Boutwell, Virginia Tech
This presentation explores refugee/citizenship, insider/outsider narratives in the lives of refugees, as illuminated by a group of African and Afro-Caribbean girls and young women engaged in Imani Nailah, a participatory action research project. Of particular interest are ways in which broader discourses of othering construct the refugee girl typology. The Imani Nailah research collective explores how girls’ varied experiences of this refugee girl typology shapes ongoing, shifting, and localized enactments of their refugee status, sense of belonging, and understanding of citizenship. By theorizing discourses of othering we seek to complicate, localize, and extend citizenship narratives.

“There Is No Word To Describe What We Feel For Each Other: Paving the Way For Lesbian Possibility and Representation in South Asian Diasporic Cinema.”
Erin Christine Tobin, New York University
In this paper I explore how two Indian diasporic filmmakers, Deepa Mehta (Fire, 1996) and Shamim Sarif (The World Unseen, 2007) use film to create the possibility for the representation of queer female desire and lesbian identity within Indian and South Asian diasporic frameworks. The paper looks at contemporary feminist and queer theories and examines how Mehta and Sarif work to transform notions of female sexuality and "lesbian" within nationalist and queer discourses, working within a traditional narrative cinematic framework and utilizing narrative conventions to "subvert the master's tools" and queer South Asian heteronormativity and transnational cinematic discourse.

Decolonizing Research: A Case Study from a Kenyan Slum
Elizabeth Swart, University of Central Florida
Audre Lorde said that "the master's tools will never dismantle the master's house." In order to create a new metaphorical "house" for our feminist scholarship, therefore, it is useful to encourage indigenous populations to create their own tools and research agendas. This presentation discusses ways in which feminist scholars can decolonize our research by building the capacity of indigenous women to conduct research of their own—research that is about themselves and which is conducted from their own perspective. This paper presents a case study based on an ethnographic field project conducted between 2007 and 2010 in Nairobi, Kenya.

Rosalee Gonzalez, Arizona State University
This study documents the intellectual genesis of a Global Xicanista Politic, rooted in one decade of scholar-activism at the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues. I document the framing shift of contemporary Xicana social justice claims found in five interventions presented at the UN. An examination of these interventions reveal a trajectory of a transformative articulation of a Xicana identity political gone global. This political, which I coin Global Xicanista Politic, has survived the abrazos and rechazos of contesting the colonial legacy that defines who is and is not "Indian" and what indigenous issues merit global attention.

'Gay-Friendly' Cape Town, Lesbian Effacements: An Intersectonal Intervention
Barbara Suzanne Fisher, Old Dominion University
In 1996, post-apartheid South Africa became the first nation to create legislation prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation, and 'gay-friendly' Cape Town emerged. The liberal constitution and the processes of globalization have provided a flow of revenue and transnational queer bodies to Cape Town; however, this flow has been uneven (Visser 2003). Despite the liberal Constitution and the highly visible, commodified queer space of Cape Town, both the literature and the imagery intended to reflect this space of gay liberation are almost exclusively that of gay, white, upper-class males. This paper seeks to disrupt such monolithic representations.

Privileging the Feminine: Even Androgyny is Masculine Rebecca Dixon, Tennessee State University
One of my primary challenges in teaching Women's Studies is to engage the problem of gender-based identity and to disrupt the privileging of the masculine and the denigration of the feminine. While the challenges appear opposed to one another initially, I argue that while we understand gender to be social constructed and that people are socialized toward certain behaviors, there is still a persistent desire to feminize and masculinize items, language, and behaviors, and to place values on behaviors that are masculine and feminine. These types of categorizations can be limiting but do not necessarily have to be problematic: The problem lies in the elevation of concepts deemed masculine and the marginalization of those deemed feminine. While this reasoning is abstract, it points to very real experiences in terms of abuse, income, and chances at happiness for not only women, but also men.

Sex/Sexuality and the General Education Student: Lil Kim vs Nicki Minaj or Beyoncé Loves Gaga
Samantha Ann Morgan-Curtis, Tennessee State University
Caught in the Jemima-Jezabel dichotomy, young African-American women likewise categorize other women absolutely. And in attempting to define their own identities and sexuality, these same women unquestioningly look to the popular culture in which they have been immersed and interpolated. They see women forced to compete against one another for position, recognition, fame, and other in-demand commodities, and then replicate this behavior in their own lives. In the introductory Women's Studies classroom these students must first deconstruct their own oversimplified views before being able to understand their own complicity in the continued positioning of women vs. women.

Continuity: A "Double Standard" in the 19th Century & Today
Helen Houston, Tennessee State University
So-called "Generation Next" students want to argue that they have achieved new levels of sexual freedom, equality, and understanding. But when confronted with Francis Ellen Watkins Harper's nineteenth-century poem 'A Double Standard,' students are forced to confront their continuing prejudices and tendency to oversimplify their own and others' sexuality.

The House That Mama Built: Historical Connection in Gloria Naylor's Mama Day
Pamela Beth June, Paine College
From a literary standpoint, Gloria Naylor's Mama Day can be used specifically at an HBCU in Georgia to emphasize the role of historical memory in understanding ourselves and our situation in history. The main characters, Ophelia Day and George Andrews, have different ways of relating to their histories (both personal and collective), and it is this disparity which contributes to the novel's ambiguous ending. It seems that George's inability to connect with his history leads to his demise, whereas Ophelia's connection to her history leads to her survival. In other words, the novel demands historical memory as a means of survival in contemporary African American communities.

Feminist Pedagogy in Sociology: Utilizations in a Majority Minority Classroom
Melencia M Johnson, Paine College
Sociology is the study of society and human social behavior. It looks at institutions, relationships, organizations, norm development, and diversity to name a few topics. Students who attend Historically Black Colleges or Universities (HBCUs) generally come from a different background that those at Majority White Institutions (MWIs). Many students are Black first generation college students who underperformed in high school or attended underperforming high schools. This includes a personal account on how the use of feminist pedagogies at HBCUs in selected sociology courses had a different outcome than when used at a MWI. It also supplements the personal account with empirical research as to why these differences exist.

A "Fate Worse than Death": Literary Perspectives on Women Who Kill
Jerilyn Fisher, Hostos Community College
To "right wrongs" perceived as both social and personal, characters in six literary works (1897-1928) take justice into their own hands. Paradoxically, these women aim to protect their victims from "a fate worse than death" by killing them. Theories of performative gender, maternal instinct and gendered crime illuminate what drives the otherwise voiceless protagonists to violence. Together, these works suggest a turn-of-the-century feminist literary crusade against forces that push ordinary women to desperate acts that finally position them as subjects in their own stories.

Creative Feminist Interventions in the Works of Barbara Kingsolver and Diana Evans
Christine Florence Vogt-William, Emory University
Two recent narratives implement the raced bodies of two sets of identical female twins as sites to challenge stereotypes of female beauty in postcolonial contexts - both corporal and mental. Simultaneously the literary device of the twins allows for the interrogation of concepts of the Self and the Other, whereby individuation processes are juxtaposed with communal belonging. My readings of the two novels address the socio-political predicaments of race and gender inequalities, where both texts are "potential repositories of historical memory."

Strong Poison: Women and Scientific Inquiry in Dorothy Sayers's Detective Fiction
Layne Parish Craig, University of Texas, Austin
This paper explores Dorothy Sayers's depictions of women performing amateur scientific experiments. While women scientists are targets of suspicion in two of Sayers's mystery novels, they are eventually proven not only innocent, but also deeply fascinating characters to detectives Lord Peter Wimsey, in particular Harriet Vane, protagonist of the feminist classic Gaudy Night (1935), who first appears investigating arsenic as part of her own writing career in Strong Poison (1930). Sayers's defense of female scientific inquiry can be read as an example of how "low culture" forms like the mystery novel can attempt significant interventions into questions of gender equality.

Critical Interventions: Black Women PhD Students & the Pursuit of Social Justice
Dennise M. Jackson, The Graduate Center, City University of New York;
Fabienne Snowden, The Graduate Center, City University of New York,
In light of "post-racial" discourse that diminishes the ongoing social impacts of intersecting oppressions based on race, class and gender, my colleague and I intend to discuss our journeys as young black women in different academic disciplines (Sociology, Social Welfare) to identify three of the critical interventions that have shaped our ability to honor our shifting identities and engage in anti-oppressive research. These include identifying support networks, engaging in cross disciplinary work and organizing, and embracing "decolonizing methodologies" (Smith, 1999). We hope to dialogue with other community members engaged in anti-oppressive work in order to have/gain useful tools and approaches.

On The Inside Looking In: Intersectionally Contextualized Burden of Empowering Praxis in Disempowering Settings
Jene E. Edwards, The ELVA Collective
Black women in socially valued settings function under assumptions power from the perspectives of these looking in. Being 'in', these women have access to power to be mobilized on behalf of those who are contextually 'out', but intersectionally 'in'. This paper presents results of interviews conducted with Black women who engaged in such practice, and descriptions of the ef-effects of their engagement in empowering praxis in the settings indicated, and some of the consequences of wielding power in these settings.

Women's and Multicultural Centers: Structural Barriers to Black Women Undergraduates' Support
Crystal Renee Chambers, East Carolina University
The purpose of this study is to gain an analytically generalizable understanding of support services for Black undergraduate women, using a women's center on a historically black campus and a diversity center on a women's college campus. Within these relatively racism and sexism free environments, programs, services, and students perceptions thereof are analyzed to conger an integrated approach towards supporting minoritized racial and gendered persons. Implications for the holistic support of students as complex individuals will be discussed.

Bodies on the Line: U.S. Prisoners of Conscience Negotiate Privilege and Power
Anya Stanger, Syracuse University
The second presenter studies what happens when ordinary individuals confront the state directly, intentionally breaking laws in protest of war, imperialism, and militarism. Prisoners of conscience in the U.S. are primarily white, middle class, heterosexual, elderly, and Christian/Christian rais---and they intend to use their privilege "for good." Similarly privileged, this presenter will discuss the challenges of simultaneously studying and engaging in "solidarity activism" against violence and across borders, with attention focused to issues of representation, relations of power, and identity.

Renegotiating Horizons: Sexuality and Academic Activism
Farah Zebr, University of Exeter
Aided by feminist perspectives in interpreting scripture, the fourth presenter explores intersections between religion and sexuality by engaging with the lived experience of non-heterosexual Muslim women. Her discussion sheds light on religious dilemmas women experience and the social challenges they navigate in order to protect their hidden sexual identity as well as their visible Muslim identity, negotiated constantly within different contexts and temporal spaces. On a parallel note, the presentation delves into reflective research processes raising questions about the active role that such academic research can inevitably play, leaning towards activism by its very contribution to knowledge.

Picturing Subjectlessness: Performing Sexuality in Nikki S. Lee's "Projects."
Jillian Hernandez, Rutgers University
In her photographs titled Projects (1997-2001) Korean-born, New York based artist Nikki S. Lee documents her interactions with groups such as 'punks', 'skaters', and 'yuppies'. Lee's representations of sexuality in Projects have been under-researched. She enacts varied sexual subjectivities through "The Lesbian Project", "The Drag Queen Project", and "The Exotic Dancers Project." I utilize the work of scholar Kandice Chuh in Imagine Otherwise to argue that the queer sexual performances in Lee's Projects advance a subjectless Asian/American discourse. Chuh theorizes that a "subjectless" Asian/American discourse performs "strategic anti-essentialisms" that make the Asian/American subject productively unknowable.

Snapshot Politics: Family Portrait as Political Statement in the 2009 Folsom Street Fair Poster
Chene Koppitz, University of Michigan, Dearborn
The 2009 Folsom Street Fair poster is examined for its potential for socio-political impact, by reviewing its challenges to dominant cultural sexual ideology/iconography. Using humor, the nuclear family becomes erotic, spilling issues of race, gender and class across the pristine floor. The poster's primary audience gets the joke, it's the notion that the image would likely be reproduced numerous times in the course of anti-gay, anti-sex rhetoric that makes it further worthy of investigation, as the sly wink seen around the globe, infuriating as it challenges the concepts of family and its make-up and definition.

Visual Healing: The Ageing Black Body as Signifier of an Alternative Black Body Aesthetic

Juanita M. Cridde, Purdue University

Historically the black female body has been a contested site. The overwhelming majority of black feminist criticism that examines issues related to the black body are focused on youthful representations. Where is the ageing nude black body in visual art? My presentation blends autoethnography and black feminist criticism to share my experience of being photographed nude as a signifier of an alternative black body aesthetic. As a fifty year old, full figured black woman (who sometimes uses a cane) I will explore the opportunity of agency and ‘visual healing’ that choosing to become the subject provides.

Sex work, intersectionality and creating art for social justice: Challenging stereotypes and stigma through photography

Moshaoua Capous-Desyllas, California State University Northridge

This presentation illustrates the use of photovoice method and its potential for challenging negative perceptions, stereotypes and stigma of female sex workers. The arts-based photovoice method allowed sex workers to represent themselves, their lives, and their needs through photography. The images from this arts-based study were displayed in multiple community art exhibits in order to educate, empower and create social change through art. The role of intersectionality informed the sex workers’ diverse experiences and their unique ways of self-expression. Art was used as activism to challenge stereotypes and stigma and the exhibits served to engage a broad audience beyond academia.

This presentation will discuss the role of self awareness and the act of storytelling with others to create a space that is transformative.

Queer Dilemmas: Methodological Challenges when Researching Youth

April Marie Sharkey, York University

This paper will examine the complexities inherent with vulnerable study participants under the age of consent. Targeting queer girls complicated the process even more. After several attempts to pass ethics protocol, both with my home University and School Board, permission was given to access students and teachers in the only queer classroom in Canada. To add to the complexity of the project, I incorporate a mixed methodology approach with questionnaires, in-depth interviews, and focused observation.

Sites of Recursive Memory: History and Agency in the Literacies of Black Female College Students

Carmen Kynard, St. John’s University

In current research, it is most likely to see black female students aggregated with black males to the bottom pole of the ‘achievement gap’ or to hear of the impossibility of a radically ‘alternative’ process and product for black female students’ literacies (since such students are supposedly doomed to the eternal hell of their blackness if they do not internalize white rules of schooling. This presentation engages a critical discourse analysis of overarching concepts in black female college students’ writing that are endemic to their own ‘endarkened epistemologies’ as a point of critique and data for institutional change.

Survey Methodology and Gender Political Inequality: Are Imported Questions Undermeasuring Women’s Activism in the Global South?

Solange Simoes, Eastern Michigan University

I argue that survey questions – designed by social scientists in the global north but replicated worldwide – under measure women’s political participation in the global south. Those measures privilege formal modes of participation and fail to capture informal activism that women, especially working class, engage in. I support this claim by describing how I designed and tested new questions, and by discussing the results in the 2002, 2005 and 2008 waves of the Belo Horizonte Area Survey, a statistically representative survey of a large metropolitan area, which I coordinated at the Federal University of Minas Gerais in Brazil.

Using Feminist Research Methods to Study Sexual Minorities

Elisabeth Sheff, Georgia State University

Traditionally cast as the “Other” by social scientists, sexual minorities have long been pathologized or misrepresented in academic research and the popular press. Using feminist research methods allows sexual minorities to tell their own stories, outside of the limited range available in traditional stigmatizing methodologies. This presentation will focus on the research methods I have found most useful in studying polyamorists (people who engage in openly conducted non-monogamous relationships) and kinksters (people who identify as kinky and often participate in BDSM or sadomasochism), highlighting the methodological issues relevant to interviewing children in sexual minority families.

"There is the Woman": Reframing Women’s Prison Writing

Wendy Wolters Hinshaw, Florida Atlantic University

This presentation argues that activist mobilizations of writing by incarcerated women often redeploy conventional discourses of criminality and femininity in their efforts to “humanize” prisoners. Focusing specifically on the film What I Want My Words To Do To You, which documents a writing group held at the Bedford Hills Correctional Facility for Women in New York, I demonstrate how the film galvanizes discourses of maternity and femininity that have been imposed on criminalized women for centuries, simply substituting an image of the monstrous female criminal with one of the female criminal as vulnerable and domestic.
Black Women's Perceptions of Incarceration and the Implications for Movement-Building
Emily Rachel Williams, DePaul University
Research shows that a slew of factors create a context in which mass incarceration of Black women is sustained and perpetuated in America. Among the factors are: disproportionate sentencing, racially biased laws, inequitable policing practices, and abuse within prison walls. The work of scholars such as, Angela Davis, Paula C. Johnson, Julia Sudbury, and Beth Richie explores the intersections of race, gender, and class to create analyses about the criminal legal system's role in the incarceration of Black women in America. This paper analyzes formerly incarcerated Black women's perceptions of incarceration and explores their implications for anti-incarceration movement-building.

Native American Girls: Human Healing and the Young Prisoner as Intellectual Tia Andrews, University of California, Berkeley
This paper will examine the philosophies and therapeutic values of Native American spiritual practices (such as beadwork, dance, and sweat lodge ceremonies) and yoga through the experiences of incarcerated Native girls on the Rosebud Indian Reservation. Central questions are: what is at stake in producing a new Native body within the juvenile prison system? When do notions of agency in prison studies prove problematic? How can we theorize the body to see it as a site of history and resistance? Does ritual change when performed in different spaces, and if so how?

In Fall 2010, I taught the first writing course for the Women, Gender, Sexuality Studies majors at UMass-Amherst. Previously, this department was known as Women's Studies. For some students, the integration of queer studies and queer politics of gender-neutral pronoun use in a writing class inspired a spirited backlash. Through a narrative analysis of anonymous student reviews at the midterm and end of the course, I consider the implications of teaching queer gender and sexuality perspectives within a feminist classroom context.

Obstacles to Our Authority: Re-Examining Feminism in the Academy
Dana Bisignani, Purdue University
This paper explores the conflict experienced by many feminist instructors when defining their authority in relation to both their students and the academy as a whole. The author considers what challenges remain to feminist pedagogy and/or professors in the structures and practices of the academy, particularly those that reinforce Christina Fissicani's concept of the "normal professor body" as the only "authentic" site of knowledge and intellectual authority. What inroads has feminist pedagogy made and what challenges remain for feminist instructors in an institution still largely based on traditional modes of knowledge production and dissemination?

What is “Comparative” about “Comparative Feminisms?”
Gulinder Arora, University of Illinois, Chicago

The rationale for this paper is to help feminist scholars and teachers grapple with the difficulties of teaching global perspectives to American students. Transnational feminists have offered important insights on how to teach the perspectives of non-western women. My paper will include a literature review of feminist writing on the teaching of transnational feminism. Much of this scholarship, however, is concerned with positionality more than actual pedagogical methods. I argue that these valuable insights may be transformed into thinking specifically about pedagogical concerns and feminist methodology.

African American Female Choreographers and the Black Aesthetic
Takiyah Nur Amin, Temple University
This research focuses on the work of two African-American female choreographers and their engagement with The Black Aesthetic during the height of The Black Power/Black Arts Movement (1960-1975). Specifically, this study examines the work of Joan Miller and Carole Johnson. Using case study method, cultural document analysis and qualitative interview this research argues that both Johnson and Miller both actively engaged and extended the Black Aesthetic through dance performance, choreography and activism during the period. Accordingly, dominant narratives concerning the creative work of Black women in particular must be augmented to include the work of these artists and their contributions.

As countless feminist theorists have argued, the state regulates individual bodies and lives of women through the social construction of the ideal woman/mother/family through the implementation of reproductive law (see, for example, Collins 2000; Luker 1996; Eisenstein 1988). With a particular emphasis on ethnography and discourse analysis, this paper addresses the following questions: how are these feminist sociological research methods political? And to what extent can such research methods be used to understand the state as a political site that influences women’s lived realities and bodies? I argue for the construction of a multi-method approach informed by Naples’ (2003) materialist feminist standpoint epistemology, and discuss the challenges of doing such research as a feminist reproductive rights activist.

Challenging Scientism: Feminist Qualitative Research within Education
Alison Happel, Georgia State University

As educational research becomes increasingly “standards” based through a return to scientism (Maxwell 2004), educational scholars are pushed to produce quantitative research that can be used to ‘prove’ the effectiveness of pedagogical methods and practices (St. Pierre 2004). As a result, qualitative research is marginalized because it does not conform to current epistemologies that assume objectivity and generalizability (Lincoln and Cannella 2004). This paper explores the politics of conducting feminist qualitative research within the current political educational climate. Within the discipline of Education, it is a very political act to conduct feminist qualitative research (Weiler 2001). I argue that, although feminist qualitative educational researchers face multiple levels of marginalization within the academy and governmental organizations, the space of marginalization can be productive (Collins 2000), and that feminist researchers are able to create spaces of resistance which directly challenge ideas of objectivity within educational research.

Gender Transgression in Early 20th Century African-American Vernacular Dance
Cookie Woolner, University of Michigan

This paper argues that the medium of dance in early 20th century African-American popular entertainment was often a site of gender and sexual transgression by women performers. I first focus on dancer and male impersonator Alberta "Bert" Whitman of the troupe the Whitman Sisters, who were known as "the royalty of negro vaudeville." I then turn to popular dancer Ethel Williams and argue that her opposition to the regulation and containment of the chorus line, and her performances with her girlfriend, singer Ethel Waters, demonstrate some of the ways that same-sex-loving African-American women performed "choreographies of female resistance." 1

The War on the Dance Floor: White Women Lindy Hopping During WWII
Kendra Rae Unruh, Purdue University

In this paper, I examine how the war and gender expectations for white women affected their participation in the Lindy Hop during WWII. While black women were stereotyped as prostitutes with venereal disease and, thus, a threat to servicemen at dance halls, white women were expected to dance with soldiers as their patriotic duty. Therefore, dancing was associated with freedom on a national level, not a claim to freedom for one’s own body. However, some of these women did rebel against these expectations and chose to dance with black men as a way to reject the oppression of white men.

Slamming: Space and the Gender Politics of Punk Rock Dance, 1975-1995
Kara Margaret Kvaran, Purdue University

The punk rock subculture had many cultural manifestations that distinguished its adherents from mainstream American society. Punk musicians and fans had their own clothing and hair styles, art forms, media outlets, and record labels. They used these distinguishing markers to claim space within the urban cities where different punk rock communities formed. Within these spaces punk rock dancing became an important signifier of authenticity and expression. This paper will trace the evolution of punk rock dance and how it both reflected and helped to create the gender politics of the subculture.

Moving Down the Soul Train Line: The Soul Train Dancer, Gender, and Popular Culture
Sonya Ramsey, University of North Carolina, Charlotte

This presentation focuses on the dancers in the popular dance and music syndicated television series Soul Train, (1970 to 2006). In this discussion, I explore the ways in which visual representations of the African American gendered body have changed over time, the impact of oversexualization on the dancers, and the ways the dance styles of the participants from the early 1970s to the 2000s have reflected the changing attitudes of young African Americans regarding Black Power, feminism, multiculturalism, Hip Hop, and sexual identity.

218. Transitioning, Training, and Transforming: Women’s Studies Within the Academy
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 2: Savannah 3

PARTICIPANTS:
Making It Legitimate: Maintaining the Possibility of Women’s Studies Within the Academy
Debra Friedman Dayton, Texas Woman’s University

Although Women’s Studies educators and programs across the country have advocated the creation of doctoral programs, there is a danger that Women’s Studies can become isolated from other programs in the academy and lose its feminist roots. This paper examines dangers to the future of Women’s Studies through its doctoral programs and shows how these dangers can and have been avoided by maintaining the inclusiveness and activism that were consistent with the founding mothers’ vision for this discipline, while giving it a legitimate status in the academy.

The Possibility of Possibility: Women’s Studies and Men’s Studies Working Together to Transform Academia
Molly Diamond-Ramirez, Texas Woman’s University

The academic discipline of Women’s Studies has attempted to incorporate women and other subjugated groups into the world of higher education in pursuit of social justice. This paper addresses the ways in which participation in Women’s Studies may be broadened and transformed by examining its biases and problematic nature and, most importantly, the possibility of working with Men’s Studies departments or programs. This piece addresses the continuing transformation of Women’s Studies and the importance of maintaining interdisciplinarity, primarily by creating bridgework with other disciplines that seek to address the gendered experience.

TransGendering Women’s Studies: Gender Studies, Naming, and the Political Project of Women’s Studies
Susan Blanche Harper, Texas Woman’s University

This paper argues that the current move to transition or rename Women’s Studies to Gender Studies risks losing the central political project of the discipline. The author examines the various arguments for and against renaming Women’s Studies as Gender Studies, including an analysis of the fundamental differences and key commonalities between the two areas of inquiry. While asserting that Gender Studies is a valid and important area of study, this paper argues that conflating Gender Studies with Women’s Studies obscures both the political nature of Women’s Studies and the diversity of Gender Studies.

219. “Taking the Body Elsewhere”: Imagining Feminist Interventions in Mainstream Health Discourses
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 2: Valdosta

Contemporary pharmacological contraceptive marketing, discursive constructions of obesity, and spatial configurations of maternity wards anticipate women’s bodies and agency in specific ways. Such modes of knowing and situating rely on projecting an imaginary, undifferentiated body ‘into’ abstract space—as consumers of pharmacological commodities, self-regulating body types, or as hyper-responsible mothers-to-be. Though these health-based discourses condition how we ‘know’ ourselves as embodied, we refuse to fully accede to these ways and sites of knowing. This workshop aims to make literal room for women to reengage with the material reality of their bodily experiences, in ways that ‘take the body elsewhere.

220. Collaborating with the Dead: Agency, Authorship, Feminism, and the Creative Act
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 1 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Letting Kitsimba Speak Through Me
M. Jacqui Alexander, University of Toronto
Presenter’s current project is a joint authorship, with Kitsimba, an African woman enslaved and executed as a witch in Diego Martin in 1802. Reconstructing Kitsimba’s story from historical sources, both interweaving it with her own and living it with Kitsimba, enables her to endure both with her readers and with Kitsimba, who first endured it, the Middle Passage as a visceral and transformative truth rather than as past history.

Times When My Story is Not Mine
Judith Johnson, Independent Scholar
Presenter’s work seeks to explore a “poetics of generosity,” derived from Muriel Rukeyser’s admonition to “Pay attention to what they tell you to forget.” Her current project is a series of story/performance/cybertext interventions with Morris and Clara Kraus, her grandparents, and their accounts of the exiles, the homelessness, and the pogroms they and their forebears experienced over centuries. Her interactive fictions use magical realist narrative techniques, Brechtian alienation devices, and folk motifs to juxtapose myth and legend against recent and current historical forces.

My Grandfather’s Biography Through Films He Never Made
Vivien Ng, University at Albany
Presenter describes her collaborative engagement with the writing of her maternal grandfather, a film-maker, diarist, and fiction writer. Audre Lorde’s Zami, a “biomythography,” has liberated her to write about his life and work in a mode that does not follow the academically safe “ethnic” biography autobiography formula. Instead of writing a straightforward account, to be published as a conventional monograph, she has experimented with emerging media to share her work via the Internet. Her fantasy is to work with filmmakers to actually produce films that her grandfather would have made himself; had circumstances and fortunes been different for him. She has drafts of his screenplays and scripts.

221. Crises of Representation: More Visibility, Less Agency?
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV

Bringing into dialogue multiple disciplinary perspectives, this roundtable engages what we perceive to be a crisis regarding the representation of women in society. Indeed, the visibility of women in the academy, the judiciary, media and popular culture, religion, the economy, and sports administration has increased in recent years. But, this newfound visibility has not necessarily translated into greater agency. We contend that future analysis of women’s representations must not only address content—woefully problematic, misleading or inaccurate as it may be—but also deconstruct the agency and power relations that result from depictions of women in each of our disciplines.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
Commercial Deployment of Feminist Tropes to Sell ‘Convenience’ to Mrs. Consumer
Kim Mckeage, Hamline University
One enduring feminist theme is the exhortation to get out of the (family) kitchen. Marketers have leveraged this theme to sell household appliances and packaged foods in the name of delivering greater convenience to women who thought they could “have it all.” Cookbooks purport to tell women the accoutrements they need to support this “liberated” lifestyle, and to “help” women engage in exchanges of market-earned wages for market-developed food products. Narrative analysis of cookbooks from the late twentieth century demonstrates one avenue of this co-optation.

Back to the Land — Back to Pure Womanhood?
Shannon M. Risk, Niagara University
“Living Simple” and “Back to the Land” movements of the latter twentieth century, championed by women like Helen Nearing, encouraged women to eschew beauty products and embrace a natural look. The beauty industry quickly co-opted this feminism with “natural-” and “organic-beauty” products, redirecting it back towards superficial ‘outer beauty’. Campaigns then and now claim that beauty products are chemical free, animal friendly, and deliver “beauty, truth, and harmony.”[1] Yet ultimately all this so-called ‘natural beauty’ can be had for the market rate—quickly veering away from the intent of the “Back-to-the-Landers” who desired women’s independence, self-reliance, and pride.[1] All Natural Beauty, http://www.allnaturalbeauty.us/; Curative Woman, http://www.curativewoman.com/

Multilevel Marketing: Liberation or Entrapment?
Stacie Bosley, Hamline University
Women around the globe seek to support their families with labor opportunities that are compatible with family responsibilities. “At-home” business opportunities are especially appealing given their promises of flexibility, independence and rewards for energy and effort. Multilevel Marketing organizations are largely populated by women who sell goods and services through social networks in the hopes of supplementing household income. This paper examines the MLM industry and seeks to understand the costs and benefits of participation—both in economic and social terms.
Don't Ask Don't Tell: the Packaged Commodity of LGBT rights in America
Adey Susan McGuffie, Southern Connecticut State University
Recent developments in LGBT civil rights, especially the disbanding of the US military's DADT policy, has created the opportunity for political popular culture to co-opt the LGBT civil rights movement. The political understanding surrounding the end of DADT creates the illusion the US government is aiding the movement, while rights that are substantial and relevant to LGBT service members are being ignored or denied outright. This paper examines how ending DADT fails to address the true underlying inequalities that exist as a result of systemic homophobia, including family dynamics and support, economic benefits, health care, dependent care, and survivor benefits.

I. Subject, Object, Abject: Black Women on View
9:25 to 10:40 am - Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:
'I Know You, You're the Devil': Abjection and Social Logic in Tyler Perry's For Colored Girls
La Small, University of California, San Diego
This paper reads Tyler Perry's 2010 film adaptation of Ntozake Shange's For Colored Girls who have considered suicide/when the rainbow is enfu a transient mutation of black feminist text into socially legible tropes of (neo)liberal logic. Juxtaposing play and film, I argue that Perry's gendered caricatures of suffering women and predatory men and his imposed linear narrative reduce dynamic subjects to non-threatening, facile, and publicly consumable (neo)liberal fantasies of black abjection. I ask how these caricatures are animated in their reception by black audiences: how are spectators solicited to identify with the film's representations of black women as failed subjects?

Abjct Subject: Desiring The Tragic Mulatta
Jennifer DeClue, University of Southern California
This paper juxtaposes two invocations of the Tragic Mulatto/a: Kara Walker's Mulatta hung by a grapevine near roadside between Tuscaloosa & Greensboro and the character of Sarah Jane's in Douglass Sink's Imitation of Life (1934). I argue that as a repository for the dual impulses of compulsion and repulsion aroused by the specter of black women's sexuality, the mulatta disrupts fantasies of racial purity and discreteness. Collapsing polarities of abject blaneness and sublime whiteness, and amplifying the perverse logics of desire and disdain, the Tragic Mulatta exceeds her fatal suffering to signify the vexed politics of our amalgamated national body.

'A Picture of Me and My Mother: " Precious, Racial Uplift and Reproductive Excess
Sara Clarke Kaplan, University of California, San Diego
This paper explores how Lee Daniel's Precious (2009) revises traditional 20th-century narratives of Black feminine uplift to present the Black female subject as simultaneously embodying post-1968 US hegemonic crisis and potential resolution. Constituted at the collision point of relentless Black hyperreproductivity and the impossibility of Black heteronormativity, Mary and Precious embody both the monstrous excess of white sexual/gender normativity and the (re)productive potential of contingently incorporating the abjected and alien Black body into the (white) nation-state. Together, they do the (re)productive work of 'making racial sense' of their own discipline, regulation, containment, and strategic abandonment as racialized surplus populations.

Diary of Mad Black Men?: Melodrama and Post-Feminist, Post-Civil Rights Ideology in Tyler Perry's Films
Nikol Alexander-Floyd, Rutgers University
Since his first major motion picture, Diary of a Mad Black Woman, debuted in 2005, writer, director, and producer, Tyler Perry has ushered in a brand of visual representation that has yielded immense financial success and been generally embraced by Black audiences. Perry is well-known for his gender cross-dressing portrayal of Madea, a gun-toting, “heroic” matriarch figure, as well as other movies, all of which center on interpersonal, familial and heterosexual romantic relationships. Why has Perry's films, plays, and television shows garnered such broad reception, particularly among Black women? What is at stake in the recursive portrayal of melodramatic narratives focused on affirming traditional, patriarchal notions of Black community? How do such narratives relate to larger national trends in the U.S.? Addressing these questions through an examination of his films, I argue that Perry's works display themes, such as narratives of return and personal transformation, consistent with post-feminist, post-civil rights ideology.

224. Testimonando: Women of Color Share Stories of Resistance and Creating Spaces in Academia
9:25 to 10:40 am - Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV
The Women of Color Collective will present a film and round-table discussion that explores the strategies of visibility, resistance, and community-building employed by Women of Color in academia to survive and thrive within academic settings. Roundtable participants will discuss the challenges and successes of civic engagement in the women's studies classroom. Questions include: How do women's studies faculty members teach students what it means to be engaged democratic citizens while taking into account systems of power and privilege? How do we responsibly prepare students at different levels (intro, upper-division, general education) for civic engagement? How do we facilitate effective relationship building between faculty and community partners as well as between partners and the students? How can civic engagement be part of "knowledge formation that exceeds academic boundaries"? This roundtable is open to all conference participants.

Social networking and the fat female athlete: Reimagining the female athlete
Candice Darlene Buss, University of North Carolina, Greensboro
Social networking has revolutionized how people learn about their world. The internet has empowered people to find ways to express themselves intellectually, creatively, and kinesthetically. By highlighting various modes of networking that fat athletes use, discussing some of the hazards inherent in health-related online activities, and comparing them to online spaces devoted to athleticism for female athletes as a whole, I seek to demonstrate how online networking can foster the notion of community virtually.

The Yoga of Fat: Bridging Fat Activism and Studies in the Unlikeliest of Places
Anna Guest-Jelley, Vanderbilt University
In this paper I explore the intersections of fat activism and studies in the unlikeliest of places—the yoga blogosphere and studio. First, I will discuss the connections between the fatosphere and the yogosphere. Second, I will discuss a recent trend in the yoga blogosphere calling for ‘real yoga,’ in contrast to the mainstream glamorous, thin, young, and white depictions of yoga and ideas about ‘real yoga’ are played out across issues of fat, body image, eating disorders, and yoga. Finally, I will give examples of ways people can work for fat acceptance outside the academy.

“Fat Women Can Really Have Fun”: The Israeli Fat Acceptance Movement
Maya Maor, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, Israel
Although anti-fat attitudes are as prevalent in Israel as they are in other western countries, until now there have been no studies exploring how fat individuals in Israel creatively resist their oppression and engage in different forms of fat-acceptance and fat activism. This study utilizes the social-constructivist framework to analyze the case of the Israeli fat acceptance community, comparing it with the US movement. Based on four sources of data, the Israeli community is analyzed along axes of gender, location, goals, and ideology. Finally, it will show how this community creates a specific notion of “fat subjectivity” that depends on shared life experiences of fat oppression rather than on an objective, actual weight or body size.

The Velveteen Fattie: Realness, Selfhood, & the Sticky Intersections of Love
Hanne Blanke, Independent Scholar
The doxa of femininity in contemporary Western culture still maintains quite clearly that to be socially valid and culturally “real,” women must be “loved” in particular ways, preferably by men. Because “being loved” is so crucial to whether women are perceived as (and indeed perceive themselves as) being valid as women and as human beings, doxa obliges them to seek, court, and enable this spectrum of “love” in every aspect of their self-presentation and social interaction at any cost. For fat women, who exist in a culture in which fatness is seen as excluding love and desire unless the love or desire is somehow compromised or deviant, the importance of achieving successful normalcy via “being loved” is magnified. This paper is an exploration of the themes and issues at stake in fat women’s experiences of social and cultural validity in regard to “being loved,” and how aspects of feminist and other antikyriarchal theory can be practically deployed in nonacademic contexts to promote alternate visions and experiences of love, desire, sexuality, and validity for fat women and indeed for all women.

This presentation is a staged reading about women of color in the academy. The words, stories and language in the play are derived from actual stories, existent research, and our theoretical critiques of these texts. These sources were utilized to develop both a performance script and a traditional scholarly essay. These two texts continue to develop simultaneously and serve to inform each other. Our presentation is a reading of the script followed by a facilitated dialogue about the ways in which women of color navigate the academy. This process serves to integrate scholarly/creative work with activist movement.

Discovering Heterosexual Bias in the Measurement of Work-Family Conflict: Can Work-Family Conflict Exist if the Family Doesn’t?
Katina Brynn Sawyer, Penn State University
Work-family conflict is defined as: a form of interrole conflict in which role pressures from work and family domains are incompatible in some respect (Greenhaus & Beutell, 1985). However, the current measures used to examine the extent to which individuals experience work-family conflict are interpersonal, reinforcing silencing structures for LGBT families at work. workers’ measurement tools limit the extent to which employees are able to report work-family conflict accurately and completely. Recognizing multiple, intersectional identities of family, as opposed to taking a unidimensional view, will allow researchers to discover more inclusive solutions for all families at work.

"I Thought This Class Was About Women!": Deploying Intersectional Feminist Frameworks and Contesting Student Resistance

Michelle (Mel) Lewis, University of Maryland, College Park

This paper examines how deploying intersectional frameworks in the classroom elicits student resistance, and addresses the possibility of using these objections to fashion teachable moments. Students often initially resist the interlocking nature of oppressions, stating, "This is not the class I signed up for!" This paper will also acknowledge the impact of Black queer female signification, presence, and performance in the classroom, and deals with assumptions about imposed views or political agendas based on the articulated intersecting identities of the instructor.

The Cultural Mythology: Deploying Feminist Intersectionality of Muslim women, Beauty and Class - Senegalese communities in New York City

Lindah Mhando, The Pennsylvania State University

Feminization of women’s labor renders a complex and nuanced reading of black-middle-class women from both fiction and real life. Taking an intersectional, cultural approach this paper examines conversations among Senegalese Hair braiders, which reveal a shared socio-cultural activity that re-shapes gender relations, Islamic customs and construction of community identity. Through semiotic analysis, I demonstrate that these images have functioned as nostalgic placeholders for pressing, yet unarticulated concerns about shifting spatial and temporal realities within the contexts of expansion/modernization and late capitalism. I show how these representations are mapped into dominant American narratives of class.

Join Ethics, Equity, Accessibility, and Diversity Committee members to develop strategies for more productively engaging difficult dialogues with colleagues in the classroom, and in NWSA. Participants will come away with concrete ways to resist the “paralysis of fear” (Beverly Tatum) many people face when working across differences. We ask: How can anti-racist white people be allies to people of color? How do we move past guilt and denial into more productive responses? How do we promote social justice practices institutionally? How can NWSA live up to its promise of “working to end racism and all forms of oppression”?

16 and Pregnant: Narrative Interventions and the “Unvarnished” Truth About Teen Pregnancy
Letizia Guglielmo, Kennesaw State University; Kimberly Wallace Stewart, Kennesaw State University

Since 2009 MTV has produced and aired 16 and Pregnant, a documentary-style series that, according to program creators, “allows young women to share their story in their own voice” and offers an “unvarnished and honest portrayal of their experience.” While the program appears to offer a creative intervention through personal narrative, reinforced with voice-over and visual cues in each episode, in this presentation we will explore how these narratives are co-opted — or colonized — by editors and producers and how women’s voices are eclipsed by male “experts,” calling us to question which story is being told.

Going Undercover: Hip Hop Feminism and African American Young Adult Literature
yolanda ann hoo, University of Northern Iowa

I analyze the cultural messages that young adult African American women, ages 12-18, are faced with on a daily basis, messages that are consistently reinforced in the media. While some would argue that these texts model a context for better decision-making, others suggest that these texts are mined in a kind of hopelessness that runs counter to the messages of a Hip Hop Feminism. I go on to suggest that one text, in particular, The Kayla Chronicles (2007), provides an exemplary model of (sub)urban realism while espousing a persuasive Hip Hop Feminist agenda.

Latina Girls and Sexual Health Education
Bianca L. Guzman, California State University, Los Angeles

The purpose of the current paper is to discuss how a program that is culturally competent and utilizes a Latina feminist framework serves to promote safer sexual behavior in Latina girls aged 13-15. I will discuss how a comprehensive sexual health education program called “the Choices CAMP School Project” has been implemented successfully. The discussion will also center on how participating girls benefit from the program. These results will be discussed in relation to how programs that serve girls of color can serve social justice functions and create transformation in the communities that the programs are implemented in.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
One of the most intractable political conflicts in the world for decades has been the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. That struggle has intensified in recent years compounded by historic uprisings in the region from Egypt to Tunisia. Inside Israel and Palestinian women peace and justice activists have been organizing on many levels on and off campuses. Recently a group of prominent feminist scholar-activists of color, following the example of Alice Walker, June Jordan and others who have visited the region, went on a historic delegation to confer, ask questions, and witness the efforts underway there and to exchange feminist strategies and ideas. This session will consist of discussion, slide presentations on the current crisis and how feminist scholars and students are playing a role. Panelists will share reflections on historic feminists of color delegation to the region.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 7
As women approach sixty percent of undergraduate populations nationally, alarms about the "feminization of education" and the "boy crisis" have intensified in both popular and academic realms, but relevant research and data collection remains almost non-existent. The various facets and relevant intersections among race, gender and class are currently under-researched, and questions pertinent to feminization, men and race in higher education have been virtually ignored. British and Irish Cultural Feminisms Between the Wars
Jill Franks, Austin Peay State University
Three female characters in Elizabeth Bowen’s The Last September (the ingénue, the New Woman, the matron) illustrate not only the disappointments of confinement within their gender roles, but also their struggle to define gender identity within a context of national identity, during the War of Independence. Similarly, Prue Ramsay, Lily Briscoe, and Mrs. Ramsay represent the Three Ages of Woman in Virginia Woolf’s To the Lighthouse. Their national identity is also in flux, as the ravages of WWI, though far-offstage from their island retreat, profoundly affect the relationships of the Ramsay family and their guests.

Learning to Live: Coping with Life After Acid Attack
Rehuma Karim, College of Brockport, State University of New York
Bangladesh is among one of the developing countries where the problem of gender disparity and discrimination against women can be observed. Amidst all inequality, many girls and women are oppressed and become victims of violent crimes like acid attack where the young women and girls are thrown acid at their face. Besides suffering from the pain of disfigurement, they also experience a loss of self-control and competence. The study will focus on few survivors who overcame the sense of loss and experienced a sense of community and sense of identity by participating in arts and cultural programs.

Madwoman in the Diaspora: War, Displacement, and Female Subjectivity in Asian American Women’s Fiction
Naomi J Edwards, Stony Brook University
This paper will consider the complex intersections of war, madness, and female subjectivity in Nora Okja Keller’s Comfort Woman and Hualing Niehs Mulberry and Peach. Both texts center around women displaced by war who immigrate to the United States before falling into madness as a result of their traumatic histories, fractured identities, and painful attempts to adjust to life in America. What I will examine in these texts of war, haunting, and madness are the ways in which these depictions of the mad immigrant are negotiated not only in terms of a national/cultural loss, but also in explicitly gendered terms.

Patriarchal Boots: Women Who Reenact the American War of Independence
Laura D’Amore, Roger Williams University
History, as a tool of patriarchy, has consistently erased the voices of women from significant historical events. As we celebrate and reinterpret these events, women often remain hidden in contemporary recreation. Battle reenactment, as a tool of historical commemoration, fiercely protects this erasure of women as historically representative of America’s true past, and while contemporary Americans may be comfortable with women donning men’s clothing, when women perform the role of soldier here they become “men.”

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Savannah 3

PARTICIPANTS:
“From Farm to Table to Classroom: Harvesting the Fruits of Women’s Labor.”
Molly Kerby, Western Kentucky University

Drawing upon the works of food activists such as Vandana Shiva and Temra Costa, the presenter will examine the roles women play in food culture, their involvement in sustainable agriculture, and the connection between food justice and human equity. Though women produce a substantial amount of the food consumed in the world, their role as producers and providers, and their critical contribution to household food security, remains unrecognized. Given women’s crucial role in sustainability, examining strategies for integrating sustainable food security into the women’s studies curriculum is crucial. The presentation will also demonstrate ways to incorporate sustainability and service-learning beyond the walls of the classroom.

“Who Cares? University Change and the Ethics of Care.”
Kristi Branham, Western Kentucky University

Major social, political, and economic shifts both on national and global levels have created a new challenge for the modern university in the United States. Pundits and scholars alike have commented on what they see as a failing outdated educational system. Absent from most discourse is the notion of caring labor as a long-term strategy. This talk examines the challenges and responsibilities of the “university” to frame a response in terms of long-term sustainability, of both human and physical resources, and considers an ethic of care as a central feature for responding to current crisis in higher education.

Jane Olmsted, Western Kentucky University

Too often leadership is described as a set of skills (seven), ignoring the reality of chaos, assimilation at the cost of self, and degradation (environmental and community). I am interested in the ways that “fractured” identities and communities impact each other, and, likewise, the healing. Drawing on the example of Paule Marshall’s Praisesong for the Widow, I explore the inter-connection between self and community as the source(s) for both the splintering and the repairing. Social/poitical theory (feminist and environmental) help to examine the inter-workings of contextualized woundedness and healing. The paper closes with an assignment that draws students into the process of self- and community healing.

243. Women’s Studies North and South: Theory, Policy, Activism
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Valdosta

The objective of the roundtable is to report on the discussions and findings of the meeting of the UNESCO-affiliated Global Women’s Studies/Gender Research Network, held at the Bellagio Conference Center in September 2011. That conference will bring together WS directors and feminist scholars from 20 institutions in 16 countries to discuss how WS programs and departments address some of the major global challenges of our time and inspire students toward theoretically-informed action for social and gender justice. They key issues are the global financial and economic crisis, and the relationship between democratization, women’s rights, and social justice for low-income women.

Queer Resolutions: 9/11 and Muslim Masculinities in Kabir Khan’s New York
Deepit Misri, University of Colorado, Boulder

This paper examines how Kabir Khan’s 2009 Bollywood film New York takes on the figure of the Muslim terrorist to interrupt some dominant discourses and representations of Muslims and Muslims. This paper focuses on the representation of Muslim men and the processes by which this representation plays on pre-existing expectations and desires. It considers the film’s representation of the Muslim terrorist figure in the context of the 9/11 attacks and the terrorist attacks in London in 2005. It explores how the film’s depiction of the Muslim terrorist figure reflects and reframes the construction of Muslim masculinity in the West and in India. It also examines the film’s representation of the Muslim terrorist figure as a site of resistance and a site of redemption. It considers the ways in which the film’s representation of the Muslim terrorist figure challenges and responds to the dominant discourses and representations of Muslims and Muslims in the West and in India.

Queer Constitutions? Disability, Diabetes and Justice Sotomayor in Popular Media

Natalie Harlin, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign

This paper examines the discourses of disability in media coverage of Justice Sotomayor's Supreme Court confirmation in 2009. During and following her nomination, media outlets figured Sotomayor's diabetes status as a "handicap" or disability potentially impacting her performance as a Supreme Court justice. Drawing on feminist theorist Gloria Anzaldua's discussions about diabetes and queer bodies, I analyze how the media portrayal of Sotomayor exposes the paradoxes of disability and capacity structuring the gendered racialization and sexualization of Latinas. My queer reading of media constructions of Sotomayor aims to offer a new method for analyzing disability, gender, sexuality and race.

246. The Clock is Ticking: (Re)Thinking the Girl Effect

PARTICIPANTS:

The Accidental Girl Effect

Emily Christine Bent, National University of Ireland, Galway

This paper explores the unintended consequences of the girl effect on Western girls' understandings of gender inequality, rights, and agency. It expands upon Sensoy and Marshalls (2010) literary identification of missionary girl power, where Western girls are encouraged to "participate in the patriarchal salvation" of their Third World sisters, and considers the ways in which this discourse shapes and constrains girls' political subjectivity (302). I argue that the girl effect persuades Western girls to re-inscribe Orientalist relations, associate rights with other girlhoods, and promote the reduction of girls' rights to economic investments in neoliberal girl power (Said 1979).

Girl "Effects": Feminist Fables or Cautionary Tales?

Heather D. Switzer, Arizona State University

This paper explores the discursive production of "third world" girlhoods in the Girl Effect's two promotional videos, "The Girl Effect" and "The Clock is Ticking." I employ Cornwall, et al.'s (2008) concept of "feminist fables" in gender and development to interrogate the possible effects of these reductive narratives of female empowerment. Calling on elements of my research on Kenyan Maasai schoolgirls' subjective perceptions of education and development in their daily lives, I argue that the girl effect and related discourses might be better understood as cautionary tales rather than fantastic narratives founded on rescue and recompense.

Girl Power with a 'Z': Girls for Corporate Gain

Elline Lipkin, University of California, Los Angeles

This paper explores how "girl empowerment" programs replicate traditional stereotypes of femininity and build girls' self-esteem according to the principals of "choice feminism." I will consider how the Girl Effect and other North American organizations leverage girls and girl power to promote a "feel-good" agenda, publicly perceived as altruistic; and will illustrate how this narrative imposes a scripted femininity paradigm, while simultaneously seeking to "raise girls up" from oppression. Utilizing Orenstein's concept of "empower-tainment" as a rubric to measure progress and regression in feminist programming for girls in America, I ask who is really served in the Girl Effect?

The Girl Effect and Identity Construction of the 'Schoolgirl' in Kono, Sierra Leone

Jordene Hale, University of Massachusetts

This paper analyzes the situated construction of the 'schoolgirl' identity as school-going girls transition from Primary to Junior Secondary School in Kono, Sierra Leone. I argue that the girl effect positions them in a liminal space and time that is rarified. Schoolgirls are seen to be morally superior to other girls and women in their community. This identity plays into the neoliberal development agenda by ignoring the realities of the global south and post-war period in Sierra Leone. It expands Switzer's (2010) research on the schoolgirl identity as a liminal space for Maasai girls in Kenya.

247. Queering the Norm? Comedic Interventions

PARTICIPANTS:

"Performances of the Non-Normative in Mainstream Film: The Kids Are All Right and Date Night"

Elizabeth Venell, Emory University

This paper argues that even films which claim to be politically and ethically progressive construct a normative center defined by its racialized and sexualized exclusions. Both make drastic exclusions from the space of the white family, excising characters and themes that do not ultimately shore up the couple's fidelity and the health of their families. Though these films lambast conservoive politics, they propogate heterosexual and neoliberal values.

"Playing with Femininity in The House Bunny."

Yael D. Sherman, Spelman College

The House Bunny mocks but ultimately reaffirms the link between women's appearance and identity. The film launches comedic critiques of the objectification of women and women's responses to that objectification. However, rather than creating a space for resistance, the film ultimately reaffirms the requirement that women shape their selves through their working on their appearance.

"I know you are, but what am I?" Pee Wee Herman and Queered Masculinities"

Julie Ann Willett, Texas Tech University

This paper examines the claim that bringing men to the daycare floor—making childcare macho—will challenge the gendered expectations of raising children. But rather than re-making day-care in the image of the privatized, heteronormative family, this paper argues that children's and caregivers' campy performances queer gender and offer greater resistance norms. The queer potential of such performances is illustrated through an analysis of Pee Wee Herman.

Deploying Feminisms at the Crossroads: Radical Political Subjectivity in Margaret Cho's Comedy

Elizabeth A. Gailey, University of Tennessee

Crossing the borders into white, male-dominated comedy has never been without risk for female comics, whose marginalization positions them precariously between abjection and insurrection. Today, in a discursive environment characterized by post-racial and post-feminist ideologies, as well as "hyper-irony and manic satire" (Hughey & Maradi, 2009: 206), female comics such as Margaret Cho may appear to reaffirm rather than challenge... mainstream sexist and racist narratives. Drawing on Gloria Anzaldúa’s border theory (1987), I examine the complex range of "feminisms" deployed by Cho, whose work, I argue, offers an intriguing example of Anzaldúa’s "radical political subjectivity" in action.

249. Authors Meet Critics: Digital Dead End: Fighting for Social Justice in the Information Age
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 2: Augusta
The idea that technology will pave the road to prosperity has been promoted through boom and bust. Today we are told that broadband access, high-tech jobs, and cutting-edge science will pull us out of our current economic downturn and move us toward social equality. In Digital Dead End, Virginia Eubanks argues that to believe this is to engage in a kind of magical thinking: a technological utopia will come about simply because we want it to. This vision of the miraculous power of high-tech development is driven by flawed assumptions about race, class, gender, citizenship and politics. The realities of the information age are more complicated, particularly for poor and working class women and families. One of the questions addressed by the book, which is based on four years of participatory action research with women living in the YWCA community of Troy, NY, is how engaged scholarship can both support progressive social movements and create better knowledge. This Author-Meets-Critics session will be focused on how, in the context of the growing immigrants’ rights struggle in Georgia and beyond, NWSA members can become more informed allies and more effective forces for social, economic and political change.

The Media(ted) Girl: Creating (Feminist) Spaces
Laura Ratner, The Pennsylvania State University
In the highly digitized public spaces that girls traverse: how do they seek to mediate, combat and/or inform messages of who they are (or not)? This paper offers insight into the challenges and triumphs in creating a girls' film program. This work highlights the curriculum of the program and the process these girls go through in creating personal narratives. The girls’ stories, the "ones that only they can tell," transcend those told by conventional media and encounter issues of difference (race, class, gender and other differences as well) in interesting and poignantly ways; girls, then, are not just sideline characters or 'tokens,' but the protagonists of their films just as they author the stories of their lives.

Women's Studies in High School Classrooms in the 21st Century
Dolana Moagadime, Brock University, Ontario Canada
The narrative of teachers' resistance to the exclusion of women's studies within high school curriculum is of paramount importance in research that specifically aims to advance gender studies in high schools. It is not without concerted efforts of both women teachers and advocacy groups working in coalition that such advancements may be envisioned and claimed as part of equity policy in district school boards. The researcher incorporated life history oriented interviews with classroom research in order to better understand the nexus between feminism sensibilities in teaching and critical consciousness. The classroom data collection included observations of lessons planned and implementation and teacher-student interactions during planned activities.

Transformational Pedagogy: Teaching about Sexuality and Gender to Pre-service Teachers
Ganiva Reyes, University of Texas, Austin
This paper is based on a self-study over my own teaching regarding gender and sexuality in a teacher education course entitled, "Sociocultural Influences on Learning" (ALD 327). I center Queer theory, intersectionality, and anti-oppressive education as a lens from which to analyze my own pedagogical approaches. The particular research questions I aim to explore are the following: 1) How did the pre-service teachers experience the pedagogical approaches I used to teach about gender and sexuality in the course? And 2) How did the pre-service teachers respond to the particular texts I utilized regarding gender and sexuality? Not only do I discuss the results of my self-study, but I also offer implications and suggestions for transformative pedagogy.

American Beauty & the Barbie Project: Questioning and Challenging the Standards
DeAnna Kay Varela, University of Texas, El Paso

The Interdimensional Writing Subject: Postmodern Reflections of Mid-Century Modern Women

Mareen Mehan Kentoff, George Washington University

Given the prevalence of feminism's wave theories, scholarship remains limited on the life narratives of American women coming of age during eras of feminist backlash. Expanding on current theories of intersectionality and feminist autobiography, this paper addresses non-canonical authors whose collections of "modern" womanhood can be viewed as postmodern re-write of the "truth" and yet does so in a way that I hope inspires listeners to think more about the possibilities of living a life where one's physical location matches one's theoretical one.

Visible/Invisible Fat: Strategies of Resistance and Resilience in Tiptree, Jr. and Reed's Short Stories

Brenda Ann Risch, University of Texas, El Paso

Examine two stories by James Tiptree Jr. and Kit Reed and compare how they craft narratives of resistance and resilience for their fat female protagonists that center on the dyad of visibility/invisibility in society. Their critiques of the modern cult of beauty and its associated mythology burn away any notion that social visibility or invisibility are absolute categories that define one's social power. In questioning this binary relationship the two authors subvert the powerful ideologies dependent on adherence to strict norms of body size and morphology that underlie tradition notions of the power of feminine beauty.

You Just Keep on Pushin' My Love: Discursive Power and the Borderline Personality Memoir

Melanie Dora Janus, The George Washington University

The marketability (and profitability) of the borderline personality diagnosis, combined with the benefit of its temporality lends it to be an extremely desirable diagnosis. I interrogate the borderline personality memoir discourse which has embraced the medical model of disability that controls and circulates knowledge about borderline personality. Using narrative theory, Foucault's ideas on discursive production, and Baudrillards concept of the simulacrum, I will both examine the consequences of this discourse and juxtapose various narrative techniques that are in defiance of not only the borderline discourse but also of normative narrative regime.

253. From Hickeys to House Burning, or Breaking the Patterns of the Master Narrative: Honing Nonfiction Craft

This creative nonfiction workshop investigates and practices craft elements that reveal feminist writers refusing to succumb to the expectations and consequences of the master narrative. It grounds the craft elements—juxtaposition and disruption, shaping scene and sections, delving into the unseen, and loading and stitching—in feminist theory that explores problems of linearity, the erasure of women's stories from history, and the refusal to grant women agency. Its focus is a hands-on approach to "deploying feminisms" and "subverting the master's tools" to open up spaces and depths that create original, provocative, and dramatic essays.

254. Hiding in Plain Sight: Queer Theory and Lesbian (In)Visibility in the Museum

10:50 to 12:05 pm  Level: Georgia 13

PARTICIPANTS:
Amy K. Levin, Northern Illinois University

This talk will move from a brief exposition of the increasing visibility of women in the museum to discussing the extent to which queer theory, with its rejection of gender binaries, allows for the greater inclusion of lesbian and gay art in museums, as well as for considering other gender minorities. In particular, I will analyze the mixed success of recent exhibitions that included images of individuals who identify as transgender.

Can the Current Trend of Gender Fluidity Bring Parity to the Masculinist Museum Hierarchy?

Linda Stein, On the Issues Magazine

Approximately one-third of the artists selected for the "Hide/Seek" exhibition were female. Yet women who expressed criticism were told they should be grateful; this fraction represented considerable progress! Curators bragged about how the ratio of male-to-female artists demonstrated gender justice. What can be done to speed the tortuously slow pace of progress toward gender equality in museums? My presentation will show how the artist, by addressing the intersections of masculinity and femininity, can help break down the male-friendly museum establishment, encouraging it to accept true gender equality with exhibitions made up of at least 50% female artists.

Subverting Masculinities: The Claiming of Space in Museum Exhibitions of Contemporary Artist Chitra Ganesh

Jessica D. Shaffer, City University of New York, Graduate Center

In her practice, contemporary artist Chitra Ganesh both inhabits and subverts the museum as an institution by engaging the traditionally male genres of mural painting and the action comic in a manner that expands the boundaries of these mediums and transgresses established modes of museum exhibition. This paper will investigate these transgressions in light of the artist's gender and sexuality, outlining her position as a lesbian artist in the art world today.
No Talking, Please: Narrative Subtexts in Lesbian and Gay House Museums in the United States
Joshua G Adair, Murray State University

This presentation will examine the presentation of sexuality and gender atypical behavior in U.S. house museums. Specifically, it explores the delivery of conflicting official and unofficial narratives. Utilizing the notion of privileged oppression, I argue that subtextual narratives drawn from clues within these museums as well as those published in materials not sanctioned by these organizations reveal a great deal about the specific sites and about museum practices prevalent today. In addition to offering a model for decoding these subtextual narratives, this paper will turn to Jane Addams’s Hull House and the Pendarvis Historic Site as case studies.

10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 2

We want to share our success in developing programming relying on a small budget and skeleton staff. Focus will be on relating individual aspects of our operations, which include and are not limited to: - Working with a steering committee comprised of faculty and university staff, which strengthens our co-curricular activities. - Utilizing social media resources to create outreach outside the walls of the center and the university. - Effective hiring of students, who can access the pulse of student populations.

Coming to Center, Coming to Voice: Women of Color & The Personal Narrative
Gabriela Margarita de Jesus, Yale University

Writing is a powerful medium through which young women of color can negotiate and transform their personal and political identities. In the tradition of writers such as Audre Lorde, Cherrie Moraga, Bell Hooks, and Nawal El Sadaawi this session will present a visual and textual narrative that centers on the artistic processes of the personal narrative as tools for personal and social transformation.

Confronting the Black/White Binary: Towards an Understanding of Afro-Latina Identity
Soibeir Latorre, Southern Connecticut State University

My paper explores literary representations of Afro-Latinidad in contemporary Caribbean diaspora writing and other forms of cultural production. Through looking at a series of women-authored poems and personal essays, I examine the ways in which the experiences of Afro-Latinas challenge the black/white binary that still dominates racial discourse in the United States. The writers and poets whose works I analyze interrogate fixed notions of racial identity from a transnational, feminist, and cross-cultural perspective, which seeks to reconcile personal and historical memory with the cultural and political values of their adopted country.

My Story in My Voice: Women of Color and Resistance Writing as Creating Feminist Transformations
Helen Crump, Minnesota State University, Mankato

In resistance writing, women of color use “voice” and narrative as tools for encouraging and creating social change, as well as for expressing the need for it. This paper analyzes how women’s voices in and of resistance articulate a feminist intervention in the demands for social justice and equality. Focusing on women’s resistance writing, I explore the experiences and narratives of women of color, as well as those published in materials not sanctioned by these organizations reveal a great deal about the specific sites and about museum practices prevalent today. The world is tilting on an uneven axis: Teaching about justice when everything hurts
Becky Thompson, Simmons College

While the liberation movements of the last 50 years have ushered in an explosion of information about many forms of oppression, our methods for teaching this material have not caught up with the content. It is as if we... expect students to hold their bodies the same way, have the same emotions, whether they are studying tax law or genocide in the Sudan, whether they are studying calligraphy or renaissance literature. In this presentation, I draw upon an intersectional analysis of knowledge about the body gained through yoga, trauma theory and indigenous methods as well as my lived-experience as a teacher and person to propose a pedagogy that engages the whole student: body, mind and spirit.

Reversing Pedagogical Genocide
Marshall Jeffries, Georgia State University

Despite the fact that ethnocide is no longer an explicit administrative policy, examination of dominant pedagogies reveals the goal of assimilation implicitly ingrained in the educational system; this system was created to serve the needs of its original attendees, European-American students. Many scholars have proposed the need for a culturally relevant pedagogy that would allow students from underrepresented ethnic and cultural groups to become educated without sacrificing their cultures in the process. Along with other educators, I attempt to reform education with culture in the center through a variety of traditions such as storytelling, community learning, and other culturally-specific methodologies

Power and Popular Education for Women’s and Gender Studies as General Ed
Ashley Glassburn Falzetti, Rutgers University

Through a desire to disrupt traditional power dynamics, new feminist teachers often go to great lengths to subvert power dynamics in their classrooms. Women’s and Gender Studies classrooms are changing as more colleges and universities incorporate WGS classes into their general education curriculum, which may require new reflections on how we approach empowerment in feminist classrooms. Drawing on my community organizing experiences with popular education at the Highlander Research and Education Center, I explore the productive uses of power for feminist empowerment of students from all backgrounds and levels of interest.

What’s Feminist About Crip Theory Now?
Alison Kafer, Southern Methodist University

Crip theory asks us to extend the richness of disability analysis by not confining the field to those sites that explicitly identify as such. In this speculative essay, I explore the theoretical terrain opened up by reading crip into queer narratives and feminist analyses in which words like ‘crip,’ ‘disability,’ and illness’ never appear. What identifications or practices might such readings make available? What spaces and subjectivities might they open up for use (or abuse)? How can crip methodologies expand our understanding of what it means to do feminist work?

Crip Drag Swan Queen: Two Readings of Darren Aronofsky’s Black Swan
Merri Lisa Johnson, University of South Carolina, Upstate

This paper uses Black Swan to demonstrate the difference between ‘feminist disability studies’ and ‘crip feminism.’ The former reveals the psychosocial disability of borderline personality disorder within the figure of the prima ballerina, identifying elements of attachment disorder, sexual abuse history, and self-injurious behaviors, as well as the workaholism that marks the high-functioning borderline. Such a reading redresses erroneous depictions and missing discourses of borderline personality disorder in mainstream U.S. media culture. In contrast, the latter apprehends the film as ‘crip drag,’ defined by excess, parody, diva pride, and the refutation of stigma by embracing all things dark and twisty.

Compulsory Sexuality and Feminist/crip Resistance in John Cameron Mitchell’s Shortbus
Cynthia Barounis, University of Illinois, Chicago

Despite the presence of crip vocabularies and icons in John Cameron Mitchell’s Shortbus, the film ultimately presents a conservative vision of wounds healed and broken bodies made whole. Moreover, the female sexual body plays a curious role in these transformations, as Sophia undergoes extensive (if unconventional) ‘therapy’ to fix the ‘problem’ of her non-organic body. By invoking recent scholarship in feminist sexuality studies, I offer a corrective to evaluations of the film as the ultimate queer crip cultural text, considering whether Shortbus’s unrelenting commitment to sex-positivity perhaps obscures important feminist insights about erotic agency, intimacy, and human fulfillment.

261. Women’s Studies and/as Civic Engagement: Research and Recommendations from the NWSA Engagement Grant Project
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 9

Karen Leong, Catherine Orr, and Theresa White will discuss the results of a two-year National Women’s Studies Association project funded with generous support from The Teagle Foundation. Women’s Studies has drawn on its activist roots in the women’s, civil rights, and student movements of 1960s and 1970s to grapple with the intellectual and practical at work in the context of what is widely known now as “civic engagement,” arguably one of the very centerpieces of liberal arts learning. The session will address the ways that women’s studies can both support and critically engage higher education’s mandate to produce more engaged citizens, focusing on highlights from the Teagle Working Group’s white paper and suggestions for curriculum design.

Karen J. Leong, Arizona State University
Catherine M. Orr, Beloit College
Theresa Renee White, California State University, Northridge

PARTICIPANTS:
The Politics of Education: Community Building and Black Feminist Activism
Shanessa R. F. Brooks-Tatum, Atlanta University Center

In working beyond the boundaries of traditional spaces, activists must learn to bridge the communities with which they are engaged. This paper considers the leadership strategies of three key, southern black women’s organizations in the 20th century – the Chautauqua Circle, The Moles, Inc., and the Neighborhood Union – and how they collectively challenged institutional strictures as they helped educate and advocate for black women and children. Then, the paper compares these successful strategies to those utilized by organizers of the Black Women’s Life Balance and Wellness Conference...
It Gets Harder, It Gets Easier: Evolutions in Maternal & Personal Agency
Amber E. Kinser, East Tennessee State University
This performance explores the ways in which maternal identity emerges out of interaction with other persons and social systems, and highlights the ways in which such external sources create tensions that are both necessary and problematic for maternal identity, authority, and agency. The piece functions as a text of resistance that not only pushes against normative expectations about maternal emotion, but also gives voice to women’s/women’s experienced point of view. In this way it moves maternal dialogue beyond mainstream pronatalist discussions and beyond abstract feminist critiques of motherhood-as-institution.

Mother’s Courage
Krynn Freehling-Burton, Oregon State University
This piece is based on an oral history project that seeks to explore answers to the question “What would your mother say is the bravest thing she’s ever done?” Specifically, the performance examines the intersecting themes of travel/migration and motherhood, embodying mothers’ lived experiences of traveling across great distance alone while pregnant or accompanied only by small children. This piece gives voice to mothers’ tenacity and courage.

We Are Not Disposable: People with Psychosocial Disabilities Claiming Epistemic Authority
Carol J. Moeller, Moravian College
Using Lorde, Siebers, and Minnich, I ask how voices of those deemed ‘crazy’ can testify and claim epistemic authority, even to themselves and to those in solidarity with them... What if ‘knowledge of the world’s cruelty’ is more likely to leave one to appear lacking in mental health than to illuminate the intricate and illusory social practices of ‘rational’ thought?

Cross-Cultural Communication and the Embodied Speaker in American Indian Women’s Autobiographies
Kay Ann Yandell, University of Wisconsin
This paper examines American Indian Women’s autobiographies given in Indian Sign Language. Sign-talk functions as a set of enactments of indigenous feminist relationships and interactions that develop between tribal people, animals and lands within and among tribal nations as well as across colonial divides. As a resister strategy, sign-talk offers new possibilities for understanding American Indian women’s positioning within the public sphere.

American Encounters: Coloniality, Epistemic Alterity and Resister Identities in Latina and Caribbean Travel and Migration Narratives
Laura Gillman, Virginia Tech
This paper explores the epistemic status of identities as these shift through an individual’s face-to-face encounters with others within different spatial economies, due to travel and/or migration. Using examples from Latina and Caribbean narrative, I show how cross-cultural encounters are shaped by pre-existing bodily scripts, as well as the ideational complexes or narratives that remap power relations on the identities of the interlocutors. While such repatterning impose a dominant model of knowledge production, it is possible for the subaltern speaker to take a resister stance.
Creating an Intersectional Dialogue Between Feminist and Queer Theories
9:30 to 10:00 am - Level 2: Savannah 3
PARTICIPANTS:
- Omalie, University of Connecticut

This paper explores the limits and possibilities of sexual citizenship and reproductive rights discourses as it constructs the rights of sexual minorities and women in different locations. This presentation focuses on a particular sexual citizenship claim, namely, access to surrogacy for the purposes of achieving parental rights for same-sex couples.

Stumbling borders, Blurring Boundaries: Producing and Inscribing Native American Women as Sexual, as Citizens, and as Humans
9:30 to 10:00 am - Level 2: Savannah 3
PARTICIPANTS:
- Barbara Gurr, University of Connecticut

This paper examines effects of liberal human rights claims on Native women's fundamental right to reproductive health. I use extensive documents to create a "doublediscourse" of care from which certain bodies are excluded, and other bodies are managed in racialized, classed, and sexed ways.

Queer and Gender Identity Performances by Latinas: The Trans-Border Spaces of Labor, Life and Love
10:15 to 10:45 am - Level 2: Savannah 2
PARTICIPANTS:
- Lorena Munoz, Westfield State College

Street vending in LA is reconfigured, organized, and supported through daily practices of Mexican and Central American immigrant women street vendors. Latina immigrants recreate cultural landscapes while constantly inventing and reconfiguring vending practices, and simultaneously performing and negotiating gendered and queer identities. Queer Latina immigrant vendors negotiate their queer and gendered identities differently across spaces in the city, creating a different place within each space. Latina immigrant vendors' spatial performance helps us understand Latina interventions, migrant street-vending practices and the production of immigrant vending spaces as not only gendered but also queer.

12:00 to 1:15 pm - Level 1: Poster Area
PARTICIPANTS:
- Marla is a Man!: Chuck Palahniuk's Fight Club as a Challenge to Social Constructions of Gender
- Sarah Jane Ervin, Grinnell College

Using a deconstructive approach to Palahniuk's Fight Club allows the understanding of Marla as a statement on masculinities. In Fight Club gender as a structure is without center and unable to exist in a traditional sense. There is no necessity for freplay and furthermore there is a complication of the structure to such a degree that gender cannot be understood as a logical binary pairing of sex and gender. Through the deconstructive approach Fight Club becomes not a statement on the return to traditional masculinities but calls for the acceptance of blurred identities.

Not My Will, but Yours be Done: Feminism and the Christian Patriarchy Movement
10:50 to 12:05 pm - Level 2: Savannah 3
PARTICIPANTS:
- Sarah Jane Ervin, Grinnell College

My research analyzes the contentious role of feminism in the Christian patriarchy movement, an Evangelical cultural phenomena that calls for a... return to "patriocentricr" family structure. While many of the subscribers to "biblical womanhood" are explicitly anti-feminist, others are re-constructing feminism in a 'separate but equal' framework that is doing ideological work both within the patriarchy movement and in the broader culture of the religious right.

Performatve Mothering: Care, Intersubjectivity, and Love in Miyazaki Films
Matthew Ray Stewart, Simmons College

I creatively explore the ethical significances, embodiments, and narratives of mothering and intersubjectivity in the acclaimed Japanese films of Hayao Miyazaki. As each of Miyazaki's films illustrate subthemes of mothering, intersubjectivity, and care, I address those performative embodiments of maternity to demonstrate that mothering is an irreducible process spanning space, time, identity, and corporeality. Following philosophical figures such as Levinas, Irigaray, and Butler, I emphasize how multiple identities become sites for embodying ethical processes of maternity and care-for-the-other.

Politicing the Personal: PostSecret Feminist Activism
Jennifer Lynn Motter, Penn State University

The purpose of this action research is to help disenfranchised women to understand, envision, and change their oppressive situations and develop a sense of empowerment (Lather, 1986) by politicizing their personal (Hanisch, 1969) via public display of activist art and critical online social network participation. My goal is for study participants to learn how to strategically use Web 2.0 skills and develop a greater sense of agency in virtual space that leads them to choose positive life paths. With study participants, I hope to use art to raise awareness of women's oppressive experiences in an effort to stop gender-based violence/hatred.

Representing the Self as "Other": Poetry as Aesthetic Constructions of Womanhood and Sexuality
Tammi Rochelle Jenkins, Louisiana State University

I use poetry from the Black Arts Movement produced by women such as Nikki Giovanni, Sonia Sanchez, Gwendolyn Brooks, & Mari Evans to explore the construction of womanhood and sexuality. I analyze the work of these poets to reveal the way that aesthetics are being used to deconstruct these social expectations, while providing counter-narratives to challenge these dominant discourses.

"Self-Selected Sterilization: New Dimensions to the Reproductive Choice Discourse"
Jessica Weaver, Old Dominion University

The current discourse surrounding reproductive choice is lacking a vital conversation. Self-selected sterilization, a controversial and often ignored topic, must be added to the current debate in order for women to gain complete control over their reproduction. The goal of this presentation is to analyze reasons behind the opposition to self-selected sterilization and illustrate with personal narratives why such an option is crucial to feminist politics.

The Feminization of Higher Education Consumption: Transhistorical Experiences of Mason's Female Doctoral Students
Marisa Allison, George Mason University

This poster examines the ways in which female doctoral students, who now comprise more than 50% of all doctoral candidates, experience graduate school and develop professional identities in an academe that remains male dominated (fewer than 25% of all full professors are women). The conclusion is that the institution views female graduate students as consumers rather than producers of knowledge, thus extending and complicating our understanding of the status of women in the academy.

Substrate Matters: Feminist Theory and Practice Responding to Transhumanism
Amy Michelle DeBaets, Emory University

This paper will examine critical and constructive feminist responses to the contemporary transhumanist movement, which has sought human perfectability largely through the rejection of human bodies and the uncritical adoption of a concept of inevitable evolutionary 'progress' toward technological / posthuman intelligence. Feminist responses are importantly critical of these underlying assumptions, but also constructive in examining the possibilities and limits of human self-transformation.

The True Memoirs of a Geisha: Deconstructing Modern Misconceptions of Japan's (In)famous Geisha
Rose Buchanan, Appalachian State University

One of the most common Western misconceptions of Japanese culture is the impression that geisha are high-class prostitutes. In fact, however, geisha are incredibly skilled women devoted to the traditional Japanese arts of dance and music. This paper will examine how such a serious misconception arose, focusing particularly on the historical role of geisha in Japanese society and the effects of the American occupation of Japan on the geisha's international image. It will also discuss how geisha use their artistic talents to preserve traditional Japanese culture while promoting female equality at the same time.

Third-Wave French Feminism?: Populist Feminist Writings in the 2000s
Michele Schaal, Indiana University, Bloomington

In the 2000s, France saw a renewed interest in feminist discourse. Organizations such as Osez le feminisme! (Dare to be feminist) were created and young women authors such as Virginie Despentes, Ovidie, Wendy Delorme or Joy Sorman published essays on the matter. Whether stated explicitly or not, all seem strongly influenced by American gender and queer theories or even by Third-wave feminism. I explore the implications and drawbacks of these French populist feminist discourses: their denunciation of llinger sex/gender discrepancies, their claiming of concepts such as intersectionality, hybridity, and gender performance, as well as their problematic relationship to former feminisms.

This is What an Anti-Racist Feminist Looks Like: The Impossibility of Feminist Transformations
Corie Hardy, Arizona State University

Although feminists and women's studies scholars have been grappling with issues of identity and authority arguably since the field's inception, this paper suggests that our continued preoccupation with identity politics severely constrains the possibilities for feminist transformations in the academy. As an anti-racist feminist who speaks from a position of skin privilege, I draw on numerous examples of the policing of my own (and of others') research and teaching interests to suggest the importance of incorporating queer theories and methodologies in order to destabilize the expectations of particular identity categories within feminist research and teaching.

Toward a Womanist Theatre: A Critical Analysis of the Black Feminist Theatre Aesthetic in Our Liberated Justice
Asantewa Sunni-Ali, Arizona State University

Historically, community was always at the center of African theatre performance, offering a space for resolving conflict and ancestral remembrance. While theatre inevitably transformed during the MAAFRA and slavery, the community uplift principle survived. Black women playwrights in particular have ensured it's survival through creating performance pieces that reflect...

The Scarlet Letter as Torture Discourse: Physical Manifestations of Power in Bodies

Madeline Scott Davis, University of North Carolina at Greensboro

Concepts of torture discourse, particularly in relation to law, have become key elements of much of 21st century feminist and Women's Studies academic discourse. By analyzing Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter, this paper discusses the ways in which heterotopic spatiality, legality, and torture are framed not only through the narrative, but also through the temporal changes from the Puritan era in which the novel takes place, to the Romantic period in which the work was written.

In response to calls to integrate ability/disability into intersectional analyses (Garland-Thomson 2002), to expand feminist disability studies to include minds as well as bodies (Nicki 2001), and to put critical race theory in dialogue with feminist disability studies (Mollow 2006), this paper applies the emerging field of crip theory (Sandahl 2003; McRuer 2004) to the adultery plot in Toni Morrison's novel, Sula, to reveal a dimension of psychosocial disability in the stereotypical figure of the Jezebel. Following Barbara Smith's assertion that Sula contains an unmarked lesbian narrative, I propose that the novel contains an unmarked narrative of borderline personality disorder.

Towards a Sistah Scholar Ethics: Black Women Studying Ourselves

Wendy Smooth, The Ohio State University

From field interviews to full ethnographies, interviewer effects, establishing trust, and protecting the identities of research participants all weigh heavily in our research considerations. But, how are these issues further complicated when the researcher and her participants share similar backgrounds and social locations? As black women studying black women, these concerns figure prominently in deciding the levels and types of information to disclose in establishing how you have come to know what you know. How do we reconcile the research imperatives of transparency while exercising a code of ethics that is attentive to the intimacies that can be produced through black women's shared conversations? In this paper, I explore these methodological and research ethics questions when we as black women study ourselves.
Intersectionality and the Current Crisis of the Black Female/Feminist Political Scientists
Nikol Alexander-Floyd, Rutgers University
This work examines the recent literature on intersectionality in political science in light of what duCille describes as the crisis of Black female intellectuals. It assesses the substantive foci and methods of this work, detailing the extent to which it centers on Black women as political subjects and Black gender politics in particular and race/gender more generally. It assesses the emphasis on intersectionality as a case study in the transformation of disciplines, and provides a comparative analysis of Black feminist scholarly developments in sister disciplines, such as sociology and history. It argues, as well, for an interpretive methodology in the pursuit of intersectionality research.

Indigenous Girls: Raising the Grandmothers of the Next Generation
Patricia M. Clarke, Athabasca University
Traditional Indigenous philosophy places women in the central role of community leader and bearer of future generations. Indigenous women educate girls so they can carry on building the nations of the future. Indigenous feminisms naturally encapsulate girls' studies and views girls and everything tied to them as vital to their own survival and their cultural survival. As teachers, healers and nurturers, Indigenous women actively influence girls in their communities and are conversely influenced by the girls in their communities through mutual engendered critical consciousness. They use formal and non-formal education processes and serve as role models to each other. Not only are they transforming their communities, they are forcing the feminist academy to re-examine itself and its knowledge systems.

"No Tan Buena Niña" - Not Such a Good Girl After All
Bianca I. Guzman, California State University, Los Angeles
When I think about the title it immediately makes me think of girls with a rebellious spirit. These girls do not conform to the ways society dictates their lives ought to be they are warriors. In Spanish the word "warrior" is guer-rera." So how do young Latina girls form a guerrera spirit? How do these girls become warriors in their emotional and cultural communities? In my presentation I will develop a concept of guerrera as an identity for young Latina girls. This presentation will reflect on the experiences of girls and teachers as guerreras. This presentation will also address the challenges that young Latina girls face as they are being socialized in a society that values conformity over empowerment and identity over assimilation. It will also address the experiences of teachers as they try to integrate these young girls into the educational system.

After To Kill a Mockingbird: Tomboyism and Multi-Ethnic Girlhood in Contemporary Children's/Young Adult Literature
Kristen Proehl, Clemson University
July 11, 2010, marked the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of Harper Lee's now classic Civil Rights novel and tomboy narrative, To Kill a Mockingbird (1960). In the years since its publication, narratives of tomboyism and race have continued to capture the literary imaginations of American audiences. Covering texts ranging from Mary Hoffman's Amazing Grace series to Jacqueline Woodson's YA novels, my current research explores the evolution of multi-ethnic narratives of gender-bending girlhood since the publication of To Kill a Mockingbird. Using a variety of theoretical lenses, including feminist and queer theory, the history of childhood, critical race theory, and cultural studies methodologies, I will discuss how juxtapositions of tomboyism, race, and social criticism have developed over the past fifty years in children's and adolescent literature. My contribution to the roundtable will emerge from my research on a final chapter of a book-in-progress titled Battling Girlhood: Sympathy, Race, and the Tomboy Narrative in American Literature.

PARTICIPANTS:
Fierce and Fabulous Feminist Teens: Reading Theory, Doing Activism
Ileana Jimenez, Little Red School House & Elisabeth Irwin High School (LEI)
This presentation highlights various practices that young feminists—both girls and boys—have implemented to voice their leadership on pressing issues relevant to them, such as blogging at the SPARK Summit about the media's sexualization of girls, working against the commercial sexual exploitation of children with GEMS (Girls Educational and Mentoring Services), testifying at a street harassment council hearing with Hollaback, and speaking out as male feminist allies at TEDxYouth—all done within a high school course on feminism. Merging theory with practice, these students tie feminist praxis as an urgent vehicle for social change.

Black Rebel Teacher: Feminist Consciousness and the Shifting of Identities in High School Classrooms
Stephanie Troutman, Berea College
As a feminist high school educator, my classrooms were sites of controversy within the mainstream public school at which I taught. In this paper/presentation I reflect on the feminist pedagogical choices that caused me to be labeled a 'rebel' at my school. As a young, black woman I was unaware of my own visibility in the predominantly white setting in which I worked. This paper also uses auto-ethnography to situate how a white, feminist teacher (whom I had as a high school student) influenced me in ways that enabled me to establish my own classrooms as feminist spaces.

On My Honor I Will Try: An Open Correspondence to the Girl Scouts of the USA...
Amy Wallace, Freelance Artist/Educator/Mentor
Emphasizing the diverse elements that contribute to self-image in women and girls of color, this inquiry focuses on the assimilation of black youth into mainstream institutions. This paper relies on the importance of feminist/black feminist studies and theoretical paradigms in out-of-school pedagogies to highlight context-specific youth of color experiences. In the form of an "open letter" to the Girl Scouts of the USA, this commentary and brief photographic journey documents a group of black girls growing up in the "contemporary" South while challenging the Girl Scout institution on racism and the effective engagement of girls and women of color.

Stretching the Small Screen: Creative Interventions for Fat and Other Marginalized Characters on Huge and The Great State of Georgia
Jennifer Lynn Jones, Indiana University, Bloomington
Producers of ABC Family shows Huge and The Great State of Georgia have designed their series to feature fat and other typically marginalized characters in a demonstration of intersectionality and potential coalition-building. This paper will thus examine creative interventions for fat characters by the producers of these shows, through their statements, reviews of their series, and presentations of their characters, to see how their efforts to disrupt conventional portrayals of fat characters and other stigmatized identities ultimately translate to the small screen and beyond.

The Power of the Fat Female Body: Resisting the Expansion of Patriarchy's Feminine Aesthetic in Favor of True Revolution
Lindsey Issow Averill, Florida Atlantic University & Keiser University
My talk was inspired by an article in the November 2009 issue of Glamour magazine entitled "Oh, Wow, These Bodies are Beautiful." The article, looking to prove plus-size models equal in Beauty to their super-thin counterparts, questioned the beauty/fashion industry’s obsession with thinness and announced Glamour magazine’s pledge to start the "body confidence revolution" (Field 241). Despite its intentions, the article and corresponding images continued the tradition of objectifying the female body—only in this case the object of the male gaze was a collection of plus-sized models. What Glamour magazine and other pro-plus-size artists and media are selling as body-positive diversity is the disguised perpetuation of female bodily oppression and female objectification. The key to fat female empowerment is not being ushered into the world of objectification but rather acceptance of the body as source of endless strength, clout, sexuality and plentiful joy.

274. Off the Beaten Path: Documenting Lesbian Land Communities in the Pacific Northwest
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 5 - AV
This roundtable presentation focuses on lesbian lands in Oregon, and on current research to document and preserve the history of these women's communities, founded in the mid-1970s and continuing to provide sanctuary and empowerment for women. Two student researchers, an archivist and documentary filmmaker, two long-time lesbian land residents, and a university manuscripts librarian will discuss these enclaves of lesbian-feminist culture, with their evolving patterns of community life, land ownership, livelihood, country living skills, spiritual practice, and creative expression. Research methodologies critical to this scholarship include oral interviews, site visits, and archival study.

275. Authors Meet Critics: Spiritual Mestizaje: Religion, Gender, Race and Nation in Contemporary Chicana Narrative
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 2: Augusta
In this volume, Delgadillo contends that spiritual mestizaje is central to Anzaldúa's life and thought, and that it provides a critical framework for interpreting contemporary Chicana narratives. Defining spiritual mestizaje as a transformative process involving a radical, sustained critique of oppression, and a renewed engagement with the sacred, Delgadillo analyzes the concept in Anzaldúa's work and in relation to existing theories and theories of oppressions. Reading contemporary Chicana narratives, she critically examines the literary and visual technologies through which Chicana novels and documentary films engage spiritual mestizaje. In powerful cultural critiques, Chicanas offers alternative visions of spirituality as they challenge normative categories of gender, sexuality, nation, and race. Well-known scholars and critics of Women's Studies, Chicano/a Studies and Religious Studies will discuss this volume in light of debate and research in these three fields.

Mastering the Methods: Investigating the Performance of Black Queer Feminist Pedagogies
Michelle (Mel) Lewis, University of Maryland, College Park

Black queer studies and Black feminist thought fashion a space for the "pedagogical body" to function as "text" in the classroom. This paper examines two methods of inquiry, education self-study and multiple case studies, and interrogates the methodological benefits and pitfalls of a research project that explores the practices and experiences of Black queer feminist pedagogues. This paper will also address how these methods explicate the ways in which self-disclosure, reflexivity, and readings of the textual body are used as intentional elements of the pedagogical project.

Exploring the Lives of Black, Deaf Women: Feminist Disability Theory and Critical Race Feminism
Lissa Denielle Place, Iowa State University

How can we better understand the experiences of those whom are at the margins of the marginalized? Transforming our understanding of intersectionality, in this paper, I focus on the experiences of Black and Deaf women and their journeys to find holistic identities and voice within the margins. Drawing on Feminist Disability Theory and Feminist Critical Race Theory, I use spoken word and American Sign Language to highlight the challenges Black and Deaf women face trying to embrace their specific identities and navigate issues of racism, sexism, and audism.

Finding Our Way Back to Vision: Using the Master’s Tools to Restore Dimension to "Same-Sex Marriage"
Robyn Epstein, University of Maryland, College Park

Somewhere we lost the question: why does same-sex marriage represent equality? This question and the limitless dimensions of queer imagination (and love) that fall outside the scope of mainstream conversations remain common in the logics of queer people. Drawing on a study that employs feminist sociological method, this paper analyzes the application of standpoint epistemology in exploring the role of marriage in the lives of queer women. In this work, I critique the successes and limitations of using qualitative interviewing to reestablish history and queer perspective in the politics of same-sex marriage.

How can ethnodrama bring feminist research to life? Through the performance of an ethnodrama that intertwines experiences, stories, and reflection, we engage with our journey through graduate education with a focus on academic socialization. With the use of ethnodrama, we center voices over facts, and accessibility over intellectualism, creating a living research document.

Unlikely Destinies

The Social Transformation Under the Bed: The Turkish Trousseau as an Unlikely Index of Change

Vla Samli, Wake Forest University

When brides reject handmade textiles in favor of mass-produced home furnishings they employ new means for materializing their futures. Vital to women's marriage preparations in Turkey, the tressouer envelopes critical transformation. This paper explores the hesitance of feminists to analyze these mundane household items as manifestations of desire, and it considers how consumption replaces craft for young women actively engaged in trans- forming love and marital equality. This paper explores the domestic arts, not high art, as meaningful indexes for social change.

Weaving Tradition and Modernity

Teresa and Her Sisters: Weaving Tradition and Modernity in a Transnational Italian Setting

Vanda Balzano, Wake Forest University

From a feminist cultural studies perspective, I will analyze how Southern Italian immigrant women brought the art of embroidery with them and transformed their role in the new society and promoted a mutual engagement between transnational communities. Their creative expressions are counteracted forms of inequality within society and family. They prove that the premodern and modern can exist together within feminist values, not only in material conditions but in philosophy and outlook. Employing the "minor" cultural value attributed to the "coppola" (hope chest), they importantly bridged cultural and local ideas of "home" with the global theories of cultural production.

Poetry Networks: Subjugated Knowledges, Cultural Politics

And the Writings of Sri Lanka's Global Garment Workers

Undya Hewamanne, Wake Forest University

His paper focuses on garment workers' poetry published in NGO magazines and written in their private journals. It analyzes how they express oppositional consciousness and resistance to global cultural flows and the homogenizing culture while managing respectability and gender and working-class identities. A focus on subaltern creative expression fills a gap in critical knowledge of how globalization affects marginalized women. This paper so investigates how networking through poetry can lay the foundation for grassroots forms of transnational solidarity, which may be an important step toward initiating democratic dialogue and concrete action.

Knitting Lessons: Weaving Communities with Yarn and Personal Stories

Mary Dalton, Wake Forest University

Her talk is going to be based on a documentary which explores the intersections of craft, narrative and communities built around sharing and the common interest in knitting. Structured around knitting lessons, that are broadly analogous to larger life lessons, Knitting Lessons follows yarn shop owner and designer Mary Stowe through a short sequence of basic knitting lessons and also engages elements of her personal narrative along with short stories of regular customers who are part of this knitting community.

Finding the Other a Home

Pramila Venkateswaran, Nassau Community College

A truly transnational feminist praxis in the curriculum is one that current feminist scholars, such as Chandra Mohanty and Jacqui Alexander, advocate. My community college, with its urban/suburban location and its wide ranging student demographic, has been engaged in shifting the academic structures to allow for such a transformative curriculum, despite challenges, such as faculty and administrative engagement. How did we overcome some of the obstacles, what were our discoveries, and what newer questions do we face?

International Faculty & Women's Studies: Challenges to Retention

Ines Shaw, State University of New York, Nassau Community College

International faculty can contribute to diversity in Women's Studies through views, perspectives and experiences embedded in colonialism, globalization, and (in)-equality in the US and abroad, but they face challenges (Demir- ezen; Andrade) that can affect their retention. What role might perceptions of international faculty play in their retention? How might the realities of working side by side affect the support of international faculty by students, non-international academics, administrators? Such questions will be explored, and suggestions to break down barriers will be proposed.

Gender inequities.

Betty J. Harris, University of Oklahoma, Norman

The protracted global recession has highlighted gender inequities at the domestic and global levels, e.g. differential access to education (Sekhon; Beoka- Betts), the digital divide (Doumato and Poussay), uneven industrialization, environmental destruction, etc. As academics, we must present our research to academic and non-governmental forums to create innovative agendas to combat the negative effects of globalization. We must collaborate with scholars and NGOs in the developing world, create a stronger relationship between theory and practice, expose our students to global studies in the classroom, and encourage them to study abroad, and to create and to work for innovative NGO's.

PARTICIPANTS:
"Standing at the Gate: Conversations Between Afro-Brazilian Jewish Women and a White U.S.-based Jewish Woman"
Abby Suzanne Gondek, San Diego State University
Moacyr Scliar's image of the centaur for Brazilian Jews in the borderlands and Gloria Anzaldúa's imaging of women as "caught in the crossfire" are both transformed by Misty Anderson's exploration of transgressive meanings of the woman centaur. Afro-Brazilian Jewish women I interviewed (2007) are spiritual, religious, sexual, and racial transgressors "caught in the crossfire" between multiple communities and identities who assert agency by breaking barriers surrounding them. This interactive performance reveals the women's determination to be recognized as Jewish despite racism, sexism and classism within Jewish and Afro-Brazilian communities and the effects on myself and other white, Jewish, U.S.-based women.

"Memorial Enactment and Israeli Militarization"
Laini Kasia Kavolaski, University of Wisconsin-Madison
Rhetorical analysis of Israeli memorial days—Holocaust Memorial Day, Remembrance Day for the Israeli Defense Force Soldier, and Independence Day—reveals how Israel shapes narratives of patriarchal citizenship and patriotism. Performance elements—sirens, silences, celebrations—create physical and narrative landscapes of Jewish history memorializing death, militarization, and victory. Those falling outside the militarized ideal narrated by the nation-state (women, Muslims, Bedoins, Druze) disrupt this national narrative of memory. A new understanding of rhetorical elements of Jewish history may reshape our engagement with the problems/compliations of historiographical inscription rather than with object-subject relationships (the land/territory or the Israeli/Palestinian people themselves).

"U.S. Jewish Women’s Spiritual Journeys of Return While Residing in Mexico"
Sharon Leder, Feminists Against Academic Discrimination
Significant numbers of U.S. women I interviewed (2004-2010) returned to Jewish self-identification while residing in Mexico. Though feminism yielded women opportunities to reclaim themselves in Jewish history and literature, to take leadership in congregational life, and to totally transform their Jewish identity in feminist terms, some U.S. women could only return to Jewish roots after leaving their country of origin. What elements of Mexican history and culture have allowed U.S. women to return to Jewish self-identification there, especially since Mexican Jews themselves have gone through a history of Inquisition that continues in the dominant culture as embedded anti-semitism?

285. The Transforming Community Project: Fact-based Community Dialogues on Race, Gender, and Sexuality
12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 1: Georgia 6 - AV
The nationally recognized Transforming Community Project mobilizes individuals in every sector of the university community in a reflective, fact-driven engagement with the University's history and current experiences of race, gender, sexuality and other forms of human difference. In this workshop, we present TCP's non-hierarchical, fact-based dialogues as a national model to engage students, staff, faculty, and alumni in honest conversation and action that will transform the university community. Participants will receive concrete training in how to excavate their own university's history of race, gender, and sexuality, and how to develop this research into a dialogue curriculum.

This is a case study of the only national organization whose sole focus is preparing women for leadership in the public policy arena. This organization exemplifies how nonprofits can enrich curriculum in the classroom and provide students with additional career development opportunities. Founded in the late '70s, the organization has served thousands of women of which more than one-third are women of color or from other populations historically under-represented in public policy leadership. Many alumnae are now accomplished leaders in Washington, DC.

Career and Change Agent Pathways for Women's and Gender Studies Graduates: Reflections, Trends, and Lessons

Participants:
- Women's and Gender Studies Students as Change Agents: Lessons from a Global Database of Women's and Gender Studies Graduates (1995-2010)
  - Tracy Berger, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill; Cheryl Off, Community College of Southern Nevada

Authors of this paper argue that not only are women's and gender studies graduates able to find fulfilling employment, they also comprise an emerging vanguard of knowledge producers, and maintain a strong commitment to gender equality and social justice after graduation. This outcome represents a revitalized feminist transformation. The authors globally surveyed 900 women's and gender studies graduates. Drawing from qualitative and quantitative data, they reflect on important trends in demographics, graduate learning, how graduates translate skills and feminist concepts used in the classroom to the workplace, and how they become change agents.

Dancing Women's and Gender Studies: How Students Negotiate Disciplinary Hierarchies of Regard

Jane Dever, University of Newcastle

Students are encouraged by the media, educational institutions, and families to pursue study pathways that promise the best return on their investment in higher education. With fields of study perceived to have strong, identifiable returns to specific labor market opportunities deemed to be more "relevant," graduates' future working lives are thoroughly negotiated. This paper draws on a comparative study of U.S., English, and Australian students enrolled in Women's and Gender Studies to explore how they negotiated the pressure to select potentially "revising" study pathways and how they understood the relationship between their chosen studies and their planned working lives after graduation.

90. Feminism from the Inside Out, or How the Personal Became Political Institutions

12:55 to 2:10 pm • Level 2: Savannah 1

This paper analyzes interviews with gender studies faculty in Chile to theorize feminist knowledge creation since Pinochet's dictatorship. As they move from communities of resistance to feminism's de-politicization within a neoliberal state, the women's narratives express nostalgia for an enemy to fight, a popular subject to defend, and a university committed to social welfare. Although imagining a past unified by oppression and resistance can limit feminist studies' present and future potentialities, the women iterate a "performative nostalgia" that does not evoke a "real" to which feminism can return. "Performative nostalgia" is constitutive of "affective communities" that create institutional feminism's possibilities.

Rewriting the Classroom Narrative: Feminist Pedagogy in the Writing Classroom and Beyond
Lisa Hages, University of Wisconsin, Waukesha

Given that composition is one of the courses that almost every college student in our country takes in their first year and its focus on effective writing strategies, it provides a unique opportunity to consider how feminist pedagogy works within the classroom. In this paper, I will not only discuss the theoretical underpinnings to this feminist pedagogical approach but also discuss the practicalities of how this sort of engagement be facilitated within the first-year writing classroom. The writing classroom is a place where conventional narratives of how gender functions in our language may be challenged as students work towards effectively address multiple audiences in their writing.

I Dare You to Look At Me: Divine and the Feminine Grotesque
Elizabeth Marie Zanichkowsky, University of Wisconsin

Divine is a troubling figure for feminist analysis of gender categories and for sexuality. It's easier to make sense of female masculinity than the kind of challenge to embodied femininity that Divine presents. Divine's appearance is a subversive reaffirmation of the female form. She follows all the rules of femininity--tied hair, plucked eyebrows, make-up, but falls, as if to say Look at me, I dare you. I will look at her, in this essay, take her dare, and examine how she challenges ideas about what is sexist, what is "raunchy" and what is powerful in gender presentation.

Battleground and Ballroom: The DIY Transition Narrative
Anders Michael Zanichkowsky, Madison AIDS Network

My research into the culture of FTM transition narratives seeks to bridge the divide between gender as defined by feminist and artistic scholarship, and gender as defined by transsexual individuals, looking at creative self-expression in the online community of video bloggers, chronicling their daily lives and thoughts about gender transition. With no connections to academia, these narratives rewrite queer theory's gender-as-concept into gender-as-physical negotiation, part physical battleground, part virtual community ballroom. Giving an insider's account, I will translate these narratives for cissexual feminist examinations of gender and identity.

Fat on Fridays and veiled on Saturdays: exploring some limitations of identity politics and human rights discourse
Ayse Vazirova, Gender Consultant UNDP - Azerbaijan

The paper explores the roles played by identity politics and human rights discourse in the public discussions of such practices as veiling/unveiling and weight gain/loss. The argument will focus on examples from the current debates surrounding Muslim headscarves in public places in Azerbaijan and Fat activism in the United States. The author argues that specific form of identity politics accepted by all discussion parties generates the conditions in which the human rights discourse serves the purpose of essentialization and becomes yet one of the instruments of limitation and oppression of women.

From Crisis to Possibility: the Invaluable Role of Women in Response to Worldwide Food Dilemmas
Analena Hope, University of Southern California

This paper will examine the myriad responses of women of color to the growing global food crisis. Whether under the radar or at the forefront of movements, the role of women in the battle for food justice is critical to the survival of poor underserved communities. I focus specifically on urban agriculture movements in the United States (particularly Detroit and Los Angeles, two metropolitan areas with high concentrations of food insecurity) and the well-documented struggle of Haitian farmers against the introduction of genetically modified organisms into their food supply, illuminating the influential role of women in each of these phenomena.

Ask A Tranny: The Body Of Investigation
Kris Grey, Ohio University

Ask A Tranny is an ongoing, interactive, public performance, social action and online project. The main goals of the project are trans visibility, education, and to raise awareness about alternative gendering. Kris Grey publicly identifies as transgendered and invites conversation by holding a sign that reads "Ask A Tranny." The residue of the public performances take the form of still images, video and audio recordings, which are then edited and represented, online. The intent is to utilize new media platforms for further dissemination, as a vehicle for continued conversation, and as a new site for the performance/action.

Where's the Justice? How Spaces Affect Social Justice Organizing on University Campuses
Rebecca Dolhinow, California State University, Fullerton

The research in this presentation is a multi-year ethnographic study of youth activism on a university campus. I examine how youth, particularly young women, become involved in social justice activism on campus. The study focuses on the role of particular spaces on campus and the ways in which they encourage activism. My focus is on a yearly social justice summit organized entirely by students, mostly women. Through observation of the organizing process and interviews with organizers and participants, the research points to the crucial importance of student friendly, non-discriminatory, progressive spaces in the cultivation of social justice activism on campuses.

Cultivating Hardiness Zones With Adolescent Girls
Lyn Mikel Brown, Colby College

Hardiness zones are safe spaces where girls work together as allies to create social change in their communities. Hardy Girls Healthy Women's Girls Coalition Groups connect middle school girls with female college student "muses" to critique, engage with, and transform what limits and harms them. This presentation explores the impact of Girls Coalition Groups on both the girls and the muses, and provides examples of the ways the girls translate what they learn into social action projects that impact their social environment.

Girls, Gardens and Community Building
Trisha Franzén, Albion College

The links between an Women's Studies class and a garden at a public school may not be immediately obvious. They weren't to us. Five years ago the class began working with girls in our middle school. Last summer we continued into the summer with program focused on food, wellness and gardening. This summer, with the support of Albion College, Albion Public Schools and the Albion Community Foundation, the college and the middle-school students are organizing a quarter-acre garden. Our goals are to share and develop a range of skills while also making local, organic food available to an economically-struggling, racial diverse community.

Girls, Food and Power: Reclaiming the Earth
Rachel Wilson Keener, Albion College

This project's goal is to first critique the racial and social class stratification of the "green" movement in the United States. The research also explores how to make the positive aspects of environmental stewardship applicable to adolescent girls that grow up in a community such as Albion, MI (e.g. a racially and economically diverse urban-profile town.) Through work in the garden, discussions about food issues, and an effort to make the garden accessible to the community with the middle-school age girls, I am studying how to make environmentalism applicable to a diverse group of people, especially to individuals who don't have the monetary means to purchase "green" products.

Neither Annies nor Annettes: American Girlhoods and Popular Culture Before and After the Introduction of the Small Screen
Rebecca Hains, Salem State University; Shayla Thiel-Stern, University of Minnesota

The development of American girl culture in the early twentieth century has long been overlooked. To further girlhood studies scholars' recent efforts, the authors collected the oral histories of 33 American women (primarily of European descent) regarding their girlhoods during a) the Great Depression and b) the immediate Post-World War II years, when television debuted and the "teenager" emerged as a target audience. Our comparative analysis reveals that despite the differences in cultural prosperity and popular culture of each cohort, some striking similarities existed—including a lack of access to or interest in girl-oriented, a devotion to music, and, for a lucky few, nostalgia for "the perfect childhood."

Recollecting and Reconstructing Queer Girlhoods of the 1950s U.S.
Amanda Hope Littauer, Northern Illinois University

obstacles, can obscure accurate recollection, but oral history stillprovides a way women of the mid-20th century United States. Existing studies of privileged adults by necessity. Meanwhile, youth sexuality is seldom a topic of inquiry either for historians of childhood or women's history or women's courses. This paper analyzes the promise—and the potential prospects—of oral history and memoir to construct histories of girlhood generally, and queer girlhoods specifically.

Girls, Memory, and Stranger Danger in the 1950s
Jennifer Helgren, University of the Pacific

Sociologists and feminist scholars have examined how in the US since the 1950s, increased media coverage of sex-crimes and stranger kidnappings created a fearful climate for parents. Girls’ perceptions of their safety, however, remain surprisingly unexplored. Part of a larger project on girls’ access to public spaces such as neighborhood streets, this paper explores the advantages and limitations of oral history (interviewing adults about their childhoods) for understanding how media coverage shaped girls’ perceptions.

Adults’ narratives about youth, which often stress freedom or overcoming obstacles, can obscure accurate recollection, but oral history still provides a window into youth experiences.

Divine Performances: A Drag Icon’s Legacy of Unrepentant
Fatness and Gender Treachery
Joelle Ruby Ryan, University of New Hampshire

Divine was an iconic drag queen of size whose filmic and performative work provided a wide array of sentiments in spectators around the globe, including euphoria, laughter, revulsion, pride and the desire to radically resist. This paper examines specific performative scenes from Divine’s diverse oeuvre to theorize how these images open up spaces of revolutionary potentiality for the unrepentant celebration of super-sized embodiments, gender anarchy and the transformation of rigid social order. How might these transgressive articulations contribute to a politics of fabulosity that resists regimes of mind-numbing gender role conformity and beauty/body fascism?

Fat and Happy: Fat Performance, Affect, and the Politics of (Joyful) Resistance
Sheena Director, Bowling Green State University

This presentation departs from a tradition of affect studies centered primarily upon “bad feelings”—shame, rage, anger—and explores the phenomenon of “good feelings” as a vis a vis fat subjectivity and fat performance. Drawing heavily upon the work of Sarah Ahmed, José Muñoz, and Lauren Berlant, I explore the way that artists, authors, and performers, such as the artist Cindy Baker or the curator of the Museum of Fat Love, Lesley Kinzel, employ good feelings” such as joy, happiness, and delight, to complicate hegemonic narratives about what fatness is (or, as I suggest, how fatness feels). Ultimately, I seek to shift our understanding of fat subjectivity from exclusively predicated upon embodiment—having fat cells, being in a “fat” body—to an affective realm, ultimately arguing that these performers, authors, and activists are making bold assertions about what it means to “feel fat” — and how that feeling might be different from what popular culture, feminist discourses, and even fat feminist and fat studies scholars have previously understood.

With a Wink and a Shimmy: Politics and Potentials of Fat Burlesque Performance
Lena Brooks, University of California, Berkeley

This paper examines contemporary neo-burlesque performance—a genre that gestures back toward the original burlesque striptease numbers of the 19th and early 20th centuries—and fat-bodied female performers’ engagement with this performance style. Burlesque, at its progressive best, utilizes transgressions of representational and sexual acceptability to mobilize new performed identities and to endow legible identities with new meanings.
While many performers choose not to engage with the genre in this way, instead opting to work within dominant narratives of representation, countless others employ the burlesque stage as a space to validate, alter, and explore marginalized identities. This paper takes as its analytical texts several performances made by fat performers and troupes as well as media produced by these performers, examining them through lenses of queer theory, performance theory, trauma theory, feminist theory, and fat studies theory and writings.

Humor, Performance and Personal Panache: How to Dive into Difficult Themes (and Enjoy Doing It!)
Kimberly Dark, California State University San Marcos

In performance, as well as in (some) performative writing, the body is the significant artifact, through which the story is told. When managing what sociologist Erving Goffman (1959) would call “spoiled identities,” our task is often to diminish the effect of stigmatized presence, so that our “better selves” can be known by our everyday audiences. Whether an identity becomes “spoiled” through non-hegemonic race or ability or gender or fat or any other appearance—we learn to manage our spoiled identities through a variety of artful means. Through performance, and performative storytelling, I show audiences an alternative to Goffman’s traditional methods of identity management. Rather than diminishing or dismissing the non-hegemonic ways I can be perceived on stage, I stand solidly in those spoiled identities—in my gender performance, my fat-able-bodiedness, my sexuality and race.

Driving While Wearing the Burqa (DWWB): Gender, Islam and National Identity in France
Catherine Raisigner, New Jersey City University
The proposed paper critically engages French immigration politics under President Sarkozy and his administration. By focusing on the debate around the burqua, the polemic that surrounded the deportation of Roma, and the threats of denationalization for certain naturalized immigrants, the paper analyzes the gendered underpinnings of the politicization of immigration in contemporary France.

Implementing Syariah in Aceh, Indonesia: Feminism and Religious Ethics from the Periphery
Reed W. Taylor, Virginia Tech
Based on interviews I conducted with Muslim women in Aceh, Indonesia between January 2009 to July 2010, I argue that the implementation of syariah in Aceh is better viewed as a site of contestation for women in Aceh between competing strands of what I identify as localized Muslim feminisms, on the one hand, and the expansion of patriarchal norms through the state, on the other. By appealing to Edward Soja's triple dialectic between space, time, and social being, I show that the clearest examples that can potentially constitute manifestations of Muslim feminisms are located on the peripheries of state power.

Bloggmg the Body: The New Arab Public & The Case of Egypt
Sarah Megan Weirich, Rutgers University
Bloggers' representations of the body often aspire to challenge and expose what is otherwise either ignored or denied by the state. Blogging produces an unregulated narrative, which counters hegemonic norms without directly confronting the state, as do other traditional forms of political or social activism. This paper presents Egyptian bloggers' writings on the body as a gendered and embodied experience of resistance. It maintains that by resisting the state's hegemonic narrative, Egyptian activists bring their local struggle to global (online) attention, and provide their readers with alternative discourses.

Yesterday's Orientalism and Today's French Muslim Women
Kelsi Shannon Hasden, Feminist Transformations
This essay acknowledges the contemporary crisis of Muslim women with the historical context of Orientalism by illustrating the plight the women face and the ways in which they battle each issue. It illustrates how Edward Said's theory of Orientalism is applied to the struggles of Muslim women living in France at the end of the twentieth century. These women face discrimination in their education, housing, and societal norms within the secular construct of French society. This alienates them from the religious structure of their home lives, causing detrimental effects to their lives and well-being.

The goal of the paper centers on examining the changes and challenges to Feminism, with an emphasis on the key issues of identity, history, culture and citizenship. The paper makes use of Irigaray's texts that are primarily in nature of talks and spontaneous discussions/exchanges, leading to an opening up of some crucial folds in current feminist thought.

Instrumentalizing Intersectionality: Examining the Problem of Nominal Use
Vivian M. May, Syracuse University
Close examination of intersectionality's "deployments" underscores how its social justice origins cannot guarantee liberatory or nuanced applications. I illustrate some risks of instrumentalizing intersectionality, including implementations that flatten, are acontextual, or ahistorical. In research, intersectionality is often enlisted as a descriptor rather than employed as a lens to analyze data or shape research processes. In policymaking, intersectionality has been applied in ways that buttress state surveillance or revert to a gendered analysis. Such nominal implementations highlight how at the same time that intersectionality is lauded, applied widely, and cited ubiquitously it is also trivialized, used reductively, and frequently misunderstood.

Anger at the Intersection of the Postfeminist and Postracial Contemporary U.S. Culture
Tanya Ann Kennedy, University of Maine, Farmington
This paper examines the deployment of anger as feminist resistance. I analyze the significance of anger as a term that reinforces sexist and racist oppression in the U.S. and its alternative significance in the history of U.S. feminisms. Then, I discuss the current discourse of anger in specific contexts in contemporary U.S. culture such as the Tucson murders and student responses to feminist issues. I argue that the management of anger works at the intersection of postfeminism and colorblind racism reinforcing young women's alienation from political discourse. Finally, I look at ways young women deploy anger to reclaim feminism.

Passionate Patriotism: Intersectionality and Discourses of Anger in the Tea Party Movement
Holloway Sparks, Emory University
According to Tea Party activists, the good citizen is a passionate patriot, a rightly angry citizen. Sarah Palin's infamous 'mama grizzlies' discourse is just one of several that constitutes passionate patriots via gender, sexual...
The Unbearable Queerness of Being: Political Drag in Pakistani Cinema
Huma Dar, University of California, Berkeley
The proposed paper interrogates the construction and consumption of Muslim masculinities, femininities, and the politics of carnivalesque subversion in Pakistani cultural texts, specifically via the analysis of the film Aurat Raj/Women's Rule (1979). In spite of, or perhaps precisely because of, the ahistorical response to its recent traumatic past and the contemporary authoritarian military rule, I argue that one can trace attempts at politico-cultural resistance in Pakistani cinema, particularly through the genre of comedy. The imposing voice of hegemony is de-privileged semantically through this film's satirical gender 'revolution,' and syntactically through an irreverent fusion of high and low culture.

What Makes This Documentary Queer?: Engaging Visualities in Introduction to LGBTI Studies
Carrie Elizabeth Hart, University of North Carolina, Greensboro
How can students imagine queer issues queerly? This paper explicates the pedagogical potential in introducing visuality as a tool with which to queer visual texts. I offer a closing reading of a day in which I invited the director of a documentary on known donor insemination into my Introduction to LGBTI class. While the documentary contains several social and legal issues that are relevant to queer communities, the potential to ask questions regarding what makes this film an explicitly "queer" project brings important questions regarding queer visibility and representation into the classroom in what I argue is productively complicated praxis.

NWSA 2011 ANNUAL CONFERENCE
MA/PhD Sponsored Reception
Saturday, November 12
5-6:30 pm  • Garden Courtyard

Representatives of the following graduate programs invite all conference participants to attend a sponsored reception:

Arizona State University, Women and Gender Studies

Holly Hughes, The Visible Lesbian
Brighde Mullins, University of Southern California; Beth Schacher, Muhlenberg College

“It gets lonely, being invisible,” she writes. Hughes has responded by performing her own works as self, not as a character. Hughes’ site of activism was literally written with and through her live performances – created specifically with her (sometimes nude) body. Her “body” of text and personal iconography (as a femme lesbian) helped her make activist interventions visible to the larger culture. In 1989 Congress defunded Hughes and three other artists (three of them queer, one a female subservive). Since that time Hughes has reclaimed her work and pushed it past the frontiers of the so-called obscene and objectionable.

“Representing the Female Body, Resisting the Male Gaze”
Margo Thompson, Muhlenberg College

Beginning in 1975, a feminist movement opposing pornography coalesced in US. Anti-pornography feminists categorized representations of women’s bodies as oppressive to women. Feminist theorist Laura Mulvey published on visual pleasure and narrative cinema locating the film viewer’s subjective gaze as always masculine and the feminine object on screen as lacking agency. Censuring representations of women’s bodies and theorizing the male gaze provoked a dilemma for feminist artists who explored women’s desire by depicting the female form. How they negotiated this problematic, and produced a visual discourse running counter to dominant feminist positions, is the subject of this paper.

313. Bodily Integrity: Meaning, Application, and Role in Human Rights
4:00 to 5:15 pm  • Level 1: Georgia 9
Throughout feminist discourses, bodily integrity is a fundamental convention, often the cornerstone of reproductive and sexual rights discussions and debates. This roundtable discussion will include a presentation offering a survey of the literature on the connection between bodily integrity and feminist human rights, and will then open up to a broader application of the concept to defining human rights with respect to the nation-state, the environment, the economy and the globalization of materials, markets and meaning.

If He Have Money in His Purse: The Celebrity Cult of the “Gold-digger” in British Literature and American Culture
Kaitlyn Gross, Cumberland University

When we look at marriage in contemporary society, we see radical differences between now and the 17th, 18th, and 18th centuries. However, when we examine celebrity marriages, especially between wealthy older men and younger women, we see a shift in the traditional narratives of marriage with the potential for radical differences.
celebrities and young women, the differences begin to fade. This paper explores how writers such as Daniel Defoe, William Thackeray, and Thomas Hardy created gold-diggers as sympathetic characters and how these male writers create the “rules” by which real, modern women are judged in society.

Protectors of the Past: How Women’s Memorial Organizations Served as a Function of Cultural and Political Authority in the Post-War South

In this paper, I argue that rather than passive victims of the Civil War, Southern women continued to perpetuate the Lost Cause as a means to assume a role of authority within their society. By uniting into war memorial organizations, women utilized acts of mourning and commemoration to assert themselves politically and protect the legacy of the fallen Confederacy. Women championed the Lost Cause to restore patriotic order and regain their position of privilege in southern society through validation of white supremacy. Thus, they redefined normative gender roles and became the protectors of the past.

A Woman at Walden: Feminist Impacts and Applications of Transcendentalism in American Culture

In Agee, Cranberry University

This paper explores how women writers and social activists in the 1830s and 1840s utilized the elements of Emerson and Thoreau’s philosophical movement to critique and remodel American society in the antebellum period. Working mainly with Margaret Fuller, Susan B. Anthony, and Carrie Nation, this paper details how these women created a gendered interpretation of Transcendentalism which could then be specifically applied to issues of gender equality and class divides.

Apprehending Silences about Gendered Racism Through Ethnography and Fiction

Jennifer L. Pierce, University of Minnesota

In interviews conducted for my research on the backlash against affirmative action, white male attorneys’ upbeat narratives of determination, hard work, and success often stopped short with uncomfortable silences when asked about raced and gender dynamics at work. What is striking is how these otherwise articulate and highly educated men whose very profession requires forceful argumentation suddenly become hesitant and inarticulate. The gap in knowledge produced through their silence highlights a limitation in ethnographic methods; it cannot access people’s innermost feelings. This paper juxtaposes ethnography with fiction as a feminist method for apprehending these silences arguing that “canonical sociological methods” work to regulate the hegemonic discourse of “colorblindness,” while fiction can provide readings countering it.

Still Decolonizing Methodologies

Hokulani K. Aikau, University of Hawai‘i, Manoa

In interviews and archival oral histories gathered for my historical ethnography of a community of Polynesian members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS Church) in Hawai‘i, I was forced to deal with moments when people actively and willingly participated in social, economic, or political processes that on the surface appeared to reproduce racializing, gendered, and colonial structures. As an indigenous feminist ethnographer I was challenged to critically analyze these narratives while also being respectful of the standpoint from which people spoke. This paper focuses on the LDS church’s Labor Missionary Program which relied on the cheap labor of Polynesian men for various construction projects in order to illustrate the complications of telling indigenous stories and the responsibility of “getting it right” while not romanticizing, exoticizing, or objectifying these men’s experiences. I argue that despite the valuable interventions made by feminist and indigenous scholars the colonial structures that produce “otherness” are still alive and well; Native and non-Native scholars working with indigenous communities must continually strive for critical reflexivity as we strive to decolonize the methodologies we use to work with and for our communities.

A History of Resistance: Flight Attendants of the 2nd Wave

Carney Michaealla Maley, University of Massachusetts, Boston

When we look back at the history of American women in the 1960-70s, several stereotypes images emerge — the feminist bra “burners” who marched for equal rights and the quintessential airline stewardesses in white pants and mini skirts. We often think of these as two distinct groups — the protestors versus the flight attendants. Understandably, the story of 2nd Wave feminism typically focuses on the protestors and pokes fun at the “Coffee, Tea or Me” girls. However, this paper argues that in some cases, these were the same women: flight attendants were also fighting for equal rights.

Rethinking the Domestic Labor Debates through the Lens of Time

Nichole M. Shippen, Ohio University

Building on Nancy Hartsock’s gendering of David Harvey’s concept of global “accumulation by dispossession,” I demonstrate how the processes of capital accumulation dispossess all people, but women in particular, of temporal autonomy. I pay special attention to the intersections between the processes of capital accumulation and the sexual, racial, and global divisions of labor between women and men and women of unequal status as situated across productive and reproductive labor. In doing so, I rethink the domestic labor debates of the socialist feminists through the lent of time by reflecting on the increasing commodification of reproductive labor since the 1970s.

Uppity Women Howling: Making Space for Working Class American Women Poets

Sharon L. Barnes, University of Toledo

In assessing how feminism both has and has not made “the world split open,” as Muriel Rukeyser said it would “if one woman told the truth about her life” (Rukeyser, Collected Poems 463), working class women’s poetry has emerged as a genre of personal and political expression, a site of ideological challenge, and a locus of representation of diverse social class perspectives, particularly within American feminist contexts. This paper proposes to outline a tradition of working class poetry in American feminism, while also making a case for and sharing the work of regional working-class poets.
The Waiter Speaks: Creative Interventions by Australian feminist Stella Miles Franklin on the Chicago Garment Workers' Strike, 1910-1911

Janet Lee, Oregon State University

This paper focuses on "The Waiter Speaks," an unpublished protest play about the 1910-1911 Chicago garment workers' strike. Written by Australian feminist Stella Miles Franklin during her time with the National Women's Trade Union League (NWWTUL), the play illustrates the ways Franklin embraced creative interventions as a critical means of feminist transformation, providing a "call to arms" that served an important means of political consciousness-raising.

318. ArchAndroid to Pretty Girl Rock: Current Conversations on Gender, Race, and Sexuality in Popular Music

4:00 to 5:15 pm • Level 2: Valdosta

This interdisciplinary roundtable brings together scholars, journalists, curators, activists, and musicans whose work engages intersecting issues of gender, race, and sexuality in contemporary popular music. We will gather perspectives from within and outside the academy, including public education initiatives; and projects that span music history/theory and creative practice. Our goals will be to examine popular music studies as currently informed by feminist, critical race, and LGBTQ theories and perspectives; highlight issues in popular music of particular relevance to women's studies/feminist classrooms; and explore innovative pedagogies for integrating popular music studies, feminist media production, and cultural politics.

Feminists in the Garden?: Developing an Intersectional Feminist Consciousness within Community Garden Movements

Alicia Woodbury, Arizona State University

Community gardening is (re)emerging as a significant social movement for an increasing number of American women. Although under-theorized as a space of contemporary feminist activism, women who are new to gardening are finding that shared-plot gardening supports a number of gendered roles and responsibilities. However, the degree to which women gardeners identify their work as feminist varies greatly and directly shapes the extent to which participation may contribute to the development of an intersectional feminist consciousness. This paper explores the potential to incorporate and further gender justice as part of the larger goals of the community garden social movement.

Teaching to a New Beat: Queer Hip Hop Interventions in the Feminist Classroom

Kathryn E. Trevenen, University of Ottawa

This paper examines recent work in both hip hop studies and feminist/ queer pedagogy to reflect on the impact of using queer hip hop in the women's studies classroom. It explores the theme of "Creative Interventions" by first looking at key themes in emerging work on hip hop pedagogy and then considering the impact of hip hop in a women's studies course. When queer hip hop artists are used to illuminate the intersection of race, gender and sexuality.

The Gendered Engagement of Young Women in Engineering

Jill M. Bystydzienski, Ohio State University; Adriane Brown, Ohio State University

Drawing on a study of more than 100 diverse girls who participated in a National Science Foundation intervention and research project, we show that young women's involvement with engineering is strongly gendered. As they engage in various aspects of learning about and "trying out" the field, they tend to gravitate to areas and practices of engineering perceived as female-appropriate and they express concerns about balancing work and family lives. Our findings indicate that the girls' perceptions and choices are influenced by how engineering is presented to young women on web sites via career fairs, and through the mass media.
The purpose of this paper is to explore the process of building a think tank in women's prison comprised of university students as women who are incarcerated. In this presentation the challenges and opportunities that have arisen as part of this work will be explored as well as the tensions created by raising consciousness and seeking change within a prison.

Ritual, Liminality and Queer Transformation in Feminist a Cappella Jams at Mount Holyoke College
Sunnen Weber, University of California, Santa Barbara
This project focuses on Mount Holyoke College as a space for both the exploration and promotion of same-sex desire and love. Specifically, I argue that the campus' culture of queerness makes use of key sites such as the a cappella jam to reinforce the status of the campus as a safe space or "bubble" for sexual fluidity and queer identities. I analyze the on-stage and digital media performances of campus a cappella groups to illustrate both their incorporation of queer songs into their repertoire and the use of homoromanticism in reappropriating existing heteronormative songs for a queer and queer-friendly audience.

321. Historicizing Prostitution, Pornography, and Politics in 19th Century California
Angela Fitzpatrick, Bowling Green State University
In 1872, Dr. Bill Holland and Caroline Churchill each introduced legislative bills regulating prostitution in San Francisco city and county. While Holland's bill targeted prostitutes as subjects needing medical and police regulation, Churchill's counter bill focused on men's complicity in prostitution and the ways in which the California labor market made prostitution an economic necessity for many women. In drawing attention to systems of class and gender inequality, Churchill deployed a feminist political point towards a broader range of social evils haunting the western American frontier.

Desiring Cuba: Eroticized Representations of Cuban Women
Susana Pena, Bowling Green State University
This paper analyzes the sexualized representation of Cuban women for U.S. audiences. Since the turn of the century, in U.S. legislative debates, international eugenics conferences, and tourism advertising, conflicting notions of Cuba's racial profile intersected with ideas about Cuba's desirability. I analyze the production of sexually explicit texts and films in Havana from the 1930s to the 1950s including pamphlets and books with sexual content published by Editorial Florida, Cubian Press, and Phedrin Press in Havana, Cuba and films with a sexual content made in the late 1940s and 1950s. This paper focuses on the racial and sexual representation of Cubans in the texts in which they emerge.

Reverent Eroticism: Sexuality and Women's Health in Woman-Authored Underground Comics
Chadwick Roberts, University of North Carolina, Wilmington
In the early 1970s woman-authored underground comics broke new ground in addressing the theme of women's sexuality. I argue that publications with provocative titles such as Tits and Clits and Wet Satin intentionally pushed the barriers of conventional good taste and at the same time reflected many of the concerns of the women's health movement in the 1970s. The women who created these comics used narrative and humor to promote women's acceptance of their bodies including elements stigmatized by commercial culture as utterly unsexy; such as menstruation and aging. The authors of these comics deployed their own brand of feminism, one based on a belief in the power of humor and creativity to argue for the centrality of women's bodies to any understanding of women's sexual liberation.

(In)Tolerable Masculinities in the Bottom Community of Toni Morrison's Sula
Erik Robert Kline, Winona State University
Much critical attention has been given to Toni Morrison's Sula since its publication in 1973. Much of this critical attention, however, focuses on feminist and race politics in the Bottom community. While these criticisms certainly help a complex understanding of the novel, I am interested in the ways Morrison depicts men and masculinity in a relatively autonomous community. By concentrating on supporting characters such as Plum Jude, and Shadrack, I will explain how the Bottom is demonstrative of society's tendency to assign expectations to male bodies and construct individual evaluations almost entirely by individuals' bodily function and use-value.

Domination and Resistance Among Minority Masculinities: An Intersectional Analysis of Hindus in Bangladesh
Fauzia Erfan Ahmed, Miami University of Ohio
The crisis of Hindu masculinities, a minority population in Bangladesh, has been little studied. Based on a continuing longitudinal ethnographic study of 200 sharecropper men and women, intersectional theory is used to explore the domination, negotiation, and resistance among Hindu masculinities. Findings reveal that hegemonic abusive (behi mare) masculinity ensures leadership by silencing high-minded (uddar) and negotiating with mixed masculinity. However, high-minded masculinity develops a matrix of resistance by redefining the concept of dharna, a key tenet of Hindu spirituality, avoiding complete subordination. The author concludes with public policy recommendations intended to highlight and support high-minded masculinity.

Frats as Gangs: The racial politics of sexual violence and the 'crisis of masculinity'
Michelle Dawn Corbin, University of Maryland
I argue that campus sexual assault prevention literatures and practices focused on men and masculinities are largely grounded in white male and particularly white fraternity communities. I outline how largely unacknowledged whiteness and white privilege constitute conceptions of campus sexual violence and institutional responses to it. I demonstrate how white privilege and the racist discourse of black criminality served to sanitize if not erase the violence of [white] fraternities. I conclude by recommending a more thorough politicization of [white] fraternity sexual violence and much deeper analysis of racialized structural inequalities that constitute the ongoing crisis of masculinity.
Sex-Talk between Korean Men and Correcting Male Citizenship: Homo-sexual/national Male-Bonding on a Transnational Match-making Site in Vietnam

Eunsung Lee, Rutgers University

This paper is part of my ethnographic research in 2007-9 on the cross-border marriages between Vietnamese women and Korean men. Based on two five-day marriage trips to Ho Chi Minh City of Vietnam and interviews with marriage brokers and Korean men in South Korea, this paper examines the discourse of masculinity in crisis and re-configuration of masculinity politics in contemporary South Korea.

Imperial Feminism and the U.S. Female Soldier: Women's Equality in the Service of Empire
Elizabeth Mesok, New York University

This paper theorizes the tensions between a critique of the U.S. military's weaponization of gender, specifically as evidenced in the use of Female Engagement Teams for counterinsurgency strategy, and the struggle for service women's equality in the military. I consider what it might look like for a feminist politics to both support women's rights in the U.S. military and remain critical of the military institution and the wars in which it is engaged. The paper will engage with scholarship on imperial feminism as well as interviews with service women who have, despite policy restrictions, served in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Politics of Memory: Recognition and Re-membering in Peru
Lynn Marie Healy, Ohio State University

I consider the relationship between the female body and memory in Peru terms of Judith Butler's question, "What counts as a livable life and a good death?" in order to reveal how body and voice serve as the underpinnings for an ethics of recognition and of re-membering. I analyze the ethics of representation in Kimberly Theidon's work Entre Projosmos (2004), the women-led Peruvian organization ANFASEP's testimonio, ¿Hasta cuándo te silences? (2007), and Claudia Llosa's controversial film La teta asustada (2009). I reveal the pivotal role of the body in determining who is worthy of being griefed and re-membered.

Is Postfeminism Fashionable? An Analysis of Lucky magazine
Gigi McNamara, Duquesne University

One form of consumption-oriented discourse targeted to women is the fashion magazine, an enduring and profitable staple of American popular culture that continues to play a pivotal role in fashion trends. Part of the influential Conde Nast group, Lucky magazine entered a crowded media landscape in 2001. While other publications ostensibly promote fashion ideals, this publication attempted to introduce a new commercial hybrid to the consumer magazine industry. This paper explores the way in which this publication has co-opted feminist discourse through a conflation of postfeminism with consumerism.

A Postfeminist Community: The Packaging, Promotion, and Representation of Postfeminism within NBC’s Situational Comedy
Lauren J. DeCarvalho, The Pennsylvania State University

Given the prevalence of postfeminism within media today, the deployment of what Diane Negra so aptly describes as feminist tools of analysis towards postfeminist texts, has never been more necessary. Using a feminist cultural studies lens, this paper aims to deconstruct the postfeminism re-packaging of feminist ideals in NBC’s situation comedy, Community. As will be argued, the show’s discourse both manipulates feminist rhetoric and ploy negative connotations of feminisms as means to promote a postfeminist agenda. Similarly, the show’s televised imagery sends conflicting messages to viewers, which ultimately deals with feminisms (and patriarchal ideologies) the upper hand.

Pleasuring Promiscuities: A Postfeminist Analysis of Sexuality on Bravo TV’s The Real Housewives
Nicole B. Cox, The Florida State University

As a formidable force in cable television, The Real Housewives (TRHW) is a reality-programming powerhouse that has created a maelstrom of success since its inception. As such, this research takes a critical approach to analyzing 55 episodes of TRHW of Orange County, through a postfeminist lens. Specifically, it explores various themes of female sexuality that are commodified and sold through TRHW’s motif, suggesting that five distinct tropes emerge as a means of re-inscribing problematic, postfeminist concerns.

Gendering U.S. Foreign Aid: Co-Opting Feminist Anti-Violence Advocacy to Wage the "War on Terror.
Kimberly A. Williams, Mount Royal University

Taking as its central text the International Violence against Women Act (IVAWA), this paper will examine the emergence and evolution of 'violence against women' as a discourse among U.S. legislators and policymakers. It will also consider the causes and consequences of the recent simultaneous deployment of this discourse with two others—(U.S.) national security and (women's rights as) human rights—in the creation and implementation of contemporary U.S. foreign policy. The central question is, "By what means and for whose benefit have these three discourses been concurrently mobilized in the text of IVAWA?"

The Risk of Women's Philanthropy in a Neoliberal Era
Stacia L. Kock, Ohio State University

Recent efforts to establish women's economic empowerment may problematically confute feminist ideals with those of neoliberalism. This paper utilizes a feminist political theoretical lens to explore the relationship between women's philanthropic empowerment and neoliberal ideals of empowerment through market productivity. Specifically, the paper incorporates recent feminist arguments (Eisenstein 2005, Fraser 2009, Hawkesworth 2002) to outline potential disadvantages of relying on market-productivity to support women's empowerment. The paper hypothesizes that though women's charitable contribution are an important tool for the advancement of feminist issues, organizational programs that support women's philanthropic endeavors problematically rely on a limiting neoliberal agenda of empowerment.

The World Bank, Violence and Disability: Deploying Feminism, Practicing Development
Corinne Lysandra Mason, University of Ottawa

According to the World Bank's "The Cost of Violence" (2009), violence that causes disability and hinders women's productivity in the workplace is a major drain on struggling economies in the developing world. Using a numerical measurement called 'disability life adjusted years' or DALY, the Bank claims that violence against women (VAW) is 'inefficient.' According to the Bank, VAW must be eliminated so women can get back to work. Deploying feminism, but practicing neoliberal development, I argue that the Bank commits a 'discursive violence' (Collins, 1998) by narrowly defining VAW according to their interests.

Criminalizing Survival: Preliminary Research Findings on Connections between Sexual Victimization and Incarceration in the United States
Mahri Irvine, American University

Drawing on feminist, materialist, and public anthropology approaches, with contributions from critical race theory/feminism and feminist criminology, my dissertation research explores connections between the incarceration of females in the United States and their prior sexual violence victimization. The majority of incarcerated women and girls have experienced sexual victimization before being imprisoned. However, the US criminal justice system often ignores the dual identity of female inmates as both survivors/victims and "offenders," frequently criminalizing the various survival strategies implemented by survivors as they attempt to cope with their traumas. In this presentation, I will share preliminary findings from my dissertation fieldwork.

The Crescent and the Cross: Negotiating Norwegian Womanhood within Religious Communities
Lauren McKown, American University

Feminist discourse has a long history of contestation concerning the patriarchal roots of religion. How are women reconciling or rejecting religion within the context of their feminist identities? How have the lived religious experiences of Norwegian women in both the Muslim and the Christian community incorporated feminist ideas into their faith? Using the research report, FEMCIT: Gendered Citizenship in Multicultural Europe (2010), as a stepping off point, this paper seeks to examine the ideological negotiation of what it means to be both feminist and religious and on a larger scale my analysis seeks to create new avenues of allies for the feminist movement.
Strong Black Womanhood Revisited: The Lived Experiences of Rural Women in East Texas
Ashante Monique Reese, American University
The strong black woman concept has been theorized and analyzed in multiple ways, often evoking imagery of an urban or historical woman. What do we lose by not including rural women's lives and stories in our analyses? What can we gain by moving toward an analysis of strong black womanhood grounded in lived experiences rather than myth and stereotype? Using Springer's (2002) analysis as a point of departure, this paper has two aims: to examine the lived experiences of women in rural East Texas and to propose strong black woman realities as an alternative way of examining black women's lives.

When the Spirit Speaks: Sacred Politics with Pedagogical Implications
Durell Maurice Callier, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
Recognizing spiritual as political (Alexander 2005), this performance examines how spiritual practices are implicated in personal/political identities and how these groundings can become central tools to empowering both students and educators within the classroom. Believing that a function of education should be the nurturing of one's mind, body, and spirit, this performance challenges educators to interrogate false binary splits of secular and spiritual. Furthermore, this narrative performance re-engages the spiritual as a tool—to critically interrogate intersections of race, sexuality, gender, and power—proffering it as a solution to raise critical consciousness, restore and recognize the value of our humanity.

Tryna Listen for the Djembe: Re-memory Schooling of the Body
Dominique Cacine Hill, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
In acknowledgment of obstacles, historical tropes, misconceptions of black girls, and the tendency to want to—try to—erase or sterilize bodies in the schooling process, this autoethnographic piece offers a re-memory of schooling. Utilizing dance and poetry embodying personal reflections of my schooling experiences in high school, this project is about re-memory and evoking emotions—the scholar-artist and audience members to generate a dialogue around bodies, schooling, and culture.

Haunted by Stories: The Life of a Storykeeper
Chamara Jewell Kwakye, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
This monologue investigates, via performance, the central dilemma of witnessing and observation in the life of a qualitative researcher. Composed of fieldnotes, transcripts and journals, the monologue explores experiences of a qualitative researcher during and after two research projects spent capturing the life histories of three Black women in the academy. Their stories push the researcher to explore her own life history and reflect on how an intimate research approach forever changes the lives of the participants and the researcher. Themes explored include the body as a homeland, the impact of geography on racial identity, and spatial memories.
Manifest A term "Girlie culture." Each of these images is based on ancient myths that, though similar in content, function extremely differently in their own social space. Ebonie Cunningham Stringer, Wingate University

Many imprisoned women are mothers to dependent-aged children. Studies note the deleterious effects of maternal imprisonment including developmental and emotional disruptions, increased likelihood of delinquency and instability in family structures. Though imprisoned mothers must relinquish the care of their children to proxy caregivers such as relatives and foster parents, many continue to express strong maternal identities. However, less is known about the ways in which they negotiate their maternal roles with their children's caregivers. This qualitative study investigates imprisoned women's co-parenting experiences with their children's proxy caregivers. Preliminary results indicate that co-parenting strategies vary by caregiver type and children profiles.

Mainstream Feminists to the Rescue: The Impact of Anti-Trafficking Discourses on Undocumented Sex Workers in Spain
Sandel Borges, University of California, Santa Barbara
This paper looks at the ways in which abolitionist anti-trafficking discourses in Spain are being utilized by the government to deport undocumented immigrant sex workers. Sex work in Spain is currently not legal, but "prostitution" is not criminalized either. However, due to abolitionist feminist discourses that categorize all sex workers as victims of trafficking, the police constantly engage in rescuing practices, harassing immigrant sex workers. The "rescue" of trafficking victims better translates into anti-immigration practices and deportation.

The Visibility of Female Bodies in Discourses of Sex Work and 'Sex Trafficking'
Chloe Emma Diamond-Lenow, University of California, Santa Barbara
This paper interrogates how the deployment of certain feminist ideas in abolitionist discourses of sex work and 'trafficking' invisibilize the experience of male and trans sex workers. Drawing from queer post-structuralist theory, I analyze how sexuality and agency are read onto gendered and raced bodies in different ways in relation to ideas about victimization, exploitation, borders, sexuality and the sanctity of the body. I propose that abolitionist discourses render women's victimization in sex work hypervisible, while invisibilizing the affect and embodiments of male and trans sex workers.

The Poetics of Rescue and the Possessive Individual, or How to Save a Prostitute in India and Feel Good
Oliver Ting, University of California, San Diego
In this paper I hope to address the affective economies that subjugate and subjectify the 'Third World woman.' In particular, I wish to interrogate the neoliberal logics of abolitionism on sex work and its reproductions of volitional subjects. Locating such economies in the largest red-light district in Kolkata, India, I seek to analyze how the rescue industry Western textile manufacturers established to save women from sex work only to assimilate them into global capitalism deploys the rhetoric of freedom and choice that falsely valorizes consumption as an ethical act of rescue by victimizing women in the Global South.

Marketing Desire: Women, Work, and Sexual Practice
Leigh Marie Dodson, University of California, Santa Barbara
Examining how sexualized labor is discursively constituted, this paper analyzes the recent consumer phenomenon of Passion Parties, a network direct selling organization that appropriates ideologically from second wave feminist consciousness raising groups and the women's health movement to access an untapped market of both workers and consumers: rural and suburban heterosexual women. Passion Parties operates as a corporate intimate public ideal for flexible labor under neoliberalism. Passion Parties promises successful careers and rewarding heterosexual relationships under the guise of "women helping women," appealing to a sense of collective heterosexual feminine history that appropriates feminist ideologies even as it depoliticizes them.

5:25 to 6:40 pm • Level 1: Georgia S - AV
During this workshop, the film "Absolutely Safe," which takes an open-minded, personal approach to the controversy over breast implant safety, will be shown and discussed by the filmmaker and the head of Our Bodies Ourselves. The film explores how the FDA and other institutions do not successfully protect women from the risks of implants because of the lobbying efforts by the corporations that produce the implants. The story of "Absolutely Safe' always focus on the women and girls who stand front and center in the traffic jam of beauty, media, risk, and "choice".

“Glorifying Obesity”: Blogging Fat Acceptance
Nicholas Reyes Franco, University of San Diego
A growing area of fat studies literature has begun to focus on how fat bodies/identities are intersecting with popular culture, gender politics, and sexuality. Some authors incorporate the ways in which cyberspaces contribute to a fat community’s political activism. There is room for more discussion, however, about how the dynamics of these communities are (re)shaping fat identities, politics, and feminisms. This paper analyzes findings of a 2-month qualitative study that explores fat-positive spaces on Tumblr, an online blogging site, and how fat-identified women are using two specific Tumblr blogs to reconstruct and politicize social stigmas cast upon their bodies.

Digitizing Queerness: Embracing the Corporeal and Space in a Digital City
Yuenmei Wong, University of Maryland, College Park
Politically, sexuality is clearly repressive in resulting public surveillance and persecution of marginalized sexualities. Nonetheless, such oppression also generates entry points for opposing strategies. While it was argued that the internet serves as a cultural capital for Queer subjects who are lacking of public resources for social mobilization, we are witnessing an increase of online homophobia attack on Queer identities in recent years. Drawing upon Elisabeth Grosz’s idea of the corporeal body in the virtual city, this paper aimed to explore both the liberatory space of internet technologies and the materiality of the cyberspace in relation to Queer activism.

Friending Feminism
Victoria Bromley, Carleton University
Sisterhood is powerful but can it be virtual? The explosion of digital technologies has created many online communities for feminist social movement, new sites for networking and new tools for education. The authors discuss the implications of feminist agency and activism in a networked world. Can mouse clicks and online petition signatures replace bodies on the streets? Engaging with social media requires thinking through and beyond the Second versus Third Wave binary identities that are taught as part of a conventional feminist education. The authors suggest that online feminist “diss-em-bodiment” allows us to recognize different powerful strategies for social change.

It’s Just Hair: African American Women, Womanist Agency, and Natural Hair Blogs
Lauren Elise Cross, Texas Woman’s University
In this study, I will argue that natural hair blogs provide platforms for womanist public pedagogy and advocacy of Afrocentric hair care traditions. Using blogging, African American women create personal and counter-narratives which combat the politics and misconceptions of Afrocentric hair. I will argue that blogging provides a space for womanist agency, empowerment, and collective dialogue amongst African American women. The paper will focus on select natural hair blogs which allow African American women to creatively explore Afrocentric hair experiences and knowledge within virtual communities.

“Women Creating Student Activists through Community Participatory Documentaries”
Jane Winslow, State University of New York, Oswego
Jane Winslow showcases how social activism documentary projects have changed from an exclusively observational vision of the producer/director to projects created by a multiplicity of voices from the community or group represented in the program. Cinema Verite, participatory, and observational style documentaries have evolved into community-participation documentaries, expanding the authorship to the people whose lives and issues are actually being represented. Now more than ever artist/activists and educators can take tools such as digital cameras and computer-based editing equipment to groups who will in turn create documents of their world.

Indigenous Activism of Kay Walking Stick: Art, Identity and the Politics of the Quincentenary
Lisa Seppi, State University of New York, Oswego
Lisa Roberts Seppi looks at indigenous involvement with the 1992 Quincentenary to examine the ways in which artists used visual work to generate awareness about contemporary Native American and First Nations art, identity, and culture and revise the historical record. Although this panel will discuss a variety of artists’ work addressing issues of gender and cultural identity, in order to avoid reiterating the impression of a unified, singular identity called “Indian,” the life, work, and experiences of the Cherokee Kay Walking Stick will be used as a case study. In addition three recurring themes dominate the artistic body of work produced for the quincentennial celebration, including the work of WalkingStick: land, memory, and culture identity.

Acting Up In and Out of Class: An Example of Student Social Justice Activism in a General Education Class
Lisa Langlois, State University of New York, Oswego; Amy Chamberlain, State University of New York, Oswego
“Monster Beauty”, a work created in Langlois’s general education visual arts class by student, Amy Chamberlain, uses visual language to critique the narrow range of beauty standards promoted by the industry. This case study describes the course and gender related activities and assignments, and through examining the art work and analysis of one of her students illustrates the power of this approach to engage students with social issues and move them to action. Chamberlain’s full artist’s statement demonstrated mastery of several concepts introduced in the course, such as market segmentation, how perceptions of an intrinsic defect build anxiety and lead to sales, “the make-over plot”, and how advertisements rely increasingly on digital technology to create an unattainable ideal. Her goal was to raise awareness of the profit motive that underpins the beauty industry and its de-facto exclusion of all real—as opposed to digitally constructed—women.

“Women’s Activist Art in Social Justice Pedagogy”
Tania Ramalho, State University of New York, Oswego
Tania Ramalho, in this introduction to the panel, discusses the tradition of social justice pedagogy in schools as a form of resistance to restrictive and alienating trends in curriculum, instruction and assessment in public schools resulting from conservative backlash and neoliberal ideologies. She indicates how the works of feminist activist artists are used to raise consciousness about social justice related issues in K-12 classrooms. Dennis Parsons inquires how photography and the interplay between image and print might
I argue that there is a void in the inclusion of aging and single black women's sexuality in contemporary black feminist literature and in black feminist literary criticism. In my paper I use the novels Sexual Healing by Jill Nelson and The Maker of Saints by Thulani Davis to analyze the relationship between aging and sensuality among single black women, 40 years and older.

Ancestral Knowledge: Women of African Ascent Incorporating Ritual to Venerate Ancestors
Martha Louise Dorsey, Kennesaw State University
Having knowledge of our loved ones who have passed on (Ancestors); and who now reside in the spiritual realm is an important aspect of one's living and social development. Although in the Western world the importance of remembering our Ancestors is not impressed upon people; other countries and ethnic groups incorporate respect, acknowledgment, and rituals to the ancestors as a part of their daily living. This paper explores Ancestral veneration of family members who continue to possess the ability to influence the fortune of the living.

PARTICIPANTS:
Toni Morrison's Tar Baby, the Post-Soul Aesthetic and Black Women's Popular Fiction
Beauty L. Bragg, Georgia College & State University
This paper examines how Tar Baby anticipates concerns of the post-soul aesthetic—the cultural mulatto and the thematic troubling of blackness—while it centralizes gendered experiences. I describe how Jadine's experience as a cultural mulatto is complicated by a history of racialized sexuality and suggest that Jadine's contrasting perception of New York and the rural southern town of Elow troubles the concept of black authenticity. I conclude that this text's deployment of feminist perspectives constitutes a bridge between canonical black fiction and contemporary black popular fiction by centering some of the sociological experiences of the late twentieth century black woman.

'How You Know it Was You': Motifs of Friendship and Desire in Black Women's Fiction
Jennifer Lynn Freeman Marshall, Purdue University
My paper traces the subject of black female sexual agency across several novels authored by black women writers whose works are explicitly influenced by black feminisms. The fictions of Toni Morrison's Sula, Thulani Davis' The Maker of Saints, and Jill Nelson's Sexual Healing, among others, rely on characterizations of "girlfriends" as a kind of primary pair bond for their plot development. These fictions challenge racialized good girl/bad girl binaries via these friendship pairs. Collective and repeated engagements of this motif, across contemporary literary and popular genres, suggest an ongoing tradition of sex/sexual revolution toward black women's sexual subjectivity.

Bound by Cultural Codes: Mediating Intimate Partner Violence in Ethnographic Research
Sidra Meredith Lawrence, University of Texas, Austin
I explore an instance of intimate partner violence that occurred during ethnographic fieldwork in northwestern Ghana. The incident was rationalized through the rhetoric of traditional cultural practices, and dismissals of "Western feminist" gender ideologies. Using the incident as a springboard, I discuss how perceptions of insider and outsider ideologies reduce individuals to culturally contained bodies. I ask, how we as feminist ethnographers can respond to violence?

Deploying Feminism to Create Collective Responsibility for Gender-Based Violence
Amy Pradip Bhatt, University of Maryland Baltimore County
I examine how feminist discourses emerging from U.S. Women of Color and immigrant anti-violence movements are mobilized as a basis for the regulation and restriction of temporary workers coming from India to the United States. This paper suggests that this common element can and should be deployed to improve the U.S. criminal justice system in a manner that is more likely to reduce and end gender-based violence.

State-Led Feminisms, Community Responses: The Specter of Domestic Violence and Temporary Migration
Amy Pradip Bhatt, University of Maryland Baltimore County
I examine how feminist discourses emerging from U.S. Women of Color and immigrant anti-violence movements are mobilized as a basis for the regulation and restriction of temporary workers coming from India to the United States. This paper suggests that this common element can and should be deployed to improve the U.S. criminal justice system in a manner that is more likely to reduce and end gender-based violence.
U.S. Simultaneously drawing on notions of retrogressive “Indian culture” and feminist domestic violence activism, official and unofficial state discourses shape temporary migration policies and practices. Drawing on ethnographies conducted in India and the U.S., I argue that these state-led interventions demonstrate the subtle ways in which feminism is incorporated and activated to regulate national borders and cultural boundaries.

Representations of Gendered and ‘Othered’ Geographies in Discourses on Oil Spills
Rachel K. Brinker, Oregon State University

This paper explores uses of gendered language in the discourse of U.S. oil spills, which can be viewed as an example of Foucauldian heterotopia, or ‘other’ space. I am exploring political and public discursive answers to, “Who is ultimately responsible for cleaning up the mess?” and the ways in which these answers may be used as tools of deflection and/or absolution from corporate and governmental responsibility for man-made disasters. As heterotopia, however, oil spills may also simultaneously be viewed as sites of feminist subversion, disruption, and/or revolution in the midst of discourses that reinscribe capitalist patriarchal power.

Embodying Intersectionality: Practising Feminist Science Studies Within the Sciences
Lisa H. Wessel, Portland State University

This paper addresses how critical and deconstructive work in feminist science studies can be applied to shape and inform research questions and praxis within two areas of science currently ripe for feminist intervention: climate science and epigenetics. Epistemological and social conflicts relating to scientific research in these fields require new approaches to revising both conventional notions of objectivity, and epistemological framings of the inter/intrarelationships between nature and culture, areas with rich feminist theoretical foci. Because of their applied and social justice implications, feminist participation in the revision of these two fields from within is both epistemologically and practically important.

Enriching the Feminist Discourse: Women of Mountain Top Removal Activism in Appalachia and Feminist Identity
Jennifer Cohen-Jordan, Appalachian State University

In reaction to the proliferation of mountain top removal coal mining in Appalachia, there has evolved a growing movement against this method of mining, with women constituting a forceful presence. Little has been generated on the experiences of women activists in coal mining activism, gender construction and feminist identity. Many of the activist women whom I have interviewed either rejected feminist identity or expressed ambivalence, while simultaneously engaging in what many would characterize as feminist behavior. This paper represents my research in understanding the relationship between feminist identity, women's mountain top removal activism and their place in the feminist discourse.

Feminist Solders of Cholera in Zimbabwe
Grace Chobela Mukupa, State University of New York, Buffalo

Since 2000, Zimbabwe has been faced with numerous challenges characterized by a hyperinflationary environment. This paper examines a debate over water crisis in Zimbabwe and how water reforms have impacted women as active agencies within the society. I argue that the water policies have a tendency to neglect the importance of women as water users and productive farmers, an omission that significantly limits the potential effectiveness of water policy reform causing chaos in health institutions.

History for Otome: Japanese Girls (and Women) Asking New Historical Questions
Kazumi Hasegawa, Emory University

For the past few years, Japanese girls have actively engaged with history from their otome perspective. Otome can be roughly translated as “girlish girls.” By looking at the phenomenon of reki o ("history girls") and otome video games, these Japanese girls expose their desires in various mediums and utilize romance as a way to ask new historical questions. On the one hand, these girls do not seem subversive, reproducing the conventional romantic narratives; on the other hand, I argue these romantic narratives have encouraged Japanese girls to ask dynamic historical questions that reimagine a Japanese history with girls as critical actors.

Recovery Missions: Imaginative Narratives that Encourage a “Total Body Compass” for Girls
Sheri Dione Davis-Faulkner, Emory University

In “Recovery Missions,” literary critic Deborah McDowell issued a call-to-action for recovering black female bodies, arguing that “[broadening the analytic paradigm] in cultural studies of the body that tend to focus on the visual: 1) ‘illuminates’ discourses ocular obsessive investments in outer body’ and 2) ‘attends to the body’s inside parts, it’s buried zones.’” Popular health discourse on childhood obesity suggests that one in four black girls in the U.S. are obese. Imaginative narratives, such as Sapphire’s Push, offer insights on black girls “buried zones” that disrupt the visual logics offered via popular discourses and put forth intervention models.

Steely Dames: Black Women Electric Guitarists and the (Re)Enchantment of the Black Female Body
Mashadi Matabane, Emory University

The electric guitar is an iconic American instrument crucial to the evolution of Southern-bred blues and rock. Ongoing masculinist bias in canonical scholarship about the two genres obscures pioneering contributions of musicians like Memphis Minnie, Peggy “Lady Bo” Jones, and Tamar-kali. My research focuses on the largely unresearched cultural history of such women. Their racialized and gendered uses of electric guitar technology enabled them to generate critical and creative imaginative narratives about black female identity and the black female body. Their public presence, performance, and self-representational choices enabled them to reconstitute themselves and restructure spaces in the American cultural imagination.

Doin' Time: Through the Visiting Glass examines the impact of incarceration on families. Ashley Lucas, the child of an incarcerated father, conducted interviews in California, Texas, and New York with prisoners' family members, former prisoners, and people who do work connected to prisons. She also corresponded with over 400 prisoners from across the U.S. Weaving together these interviews and letters with her personal experience as a prisoner's child and creative writing, Lucas wrote a one-person show which she performs herself. Doin' Time uses monologues, voice overs, and video to take the audience through a variety of perspectives on the families of the incarcerated.

The ‘Right’ Image: Representing Women’s Rights in Documentary Film
Swati Bandi, State University of New York, Buffalo
The issue of women’s rights (political, civil, etc.) has been an abiding preoccupation for independent documentary filmmakers in India. The issue of violence against women has been consistently documented by filmmakers to foreground the state’s inadequacies and took on unprecedented importance in the feminist mobilization that occurred in the late 1980s and 1990s, as seen in feminist documentary films made during that period. More recently, the internationalization of the rights-discourse has created a market for documentary images of abject, so-called third world women that are ‘hostage to a rights discourse,’ which tends to dehistoricize women’s narratives of violence.

“Ami Samakami”: Same-Sex Desires and Community in Kolkata
Niharika Banerjea, University of Southern Indiana
Recent work exploring lesbian experiences in India emphasizes that lesbian and feminist causes must work together to respond to ‘compulsory heterosexuality.’ This position raises several issues, among which the tenuous nature of same-sex experiences and the possibility of community are abiding concerns. As Vanita (2002) points out in the context of the two female characters in the film Fire, if categories are inherently limiting, then what type of same-sex desiring subjects are possible beyond the primarily urban upper middle-class English speaking environment in which ‘gay’ and ‘lesbian’ identifying selves exist? This paper is interested in those contexts within which same-sex communities are possible in India between self-identified and apparently absent same-sex subjectivities. Drawing from fieldwork among middle-class women in Kolkata, I discuss the possibility of same-sex desiring communities within patriarchal structures, and not as discrete identities at the margins of a heteronormative city.

Extraterrestrial Queers Fly Over the Equality Rainbow: Reflections on the Politics of Quererness, Immigration Reform & Radical Love
Debanuj Dasgupta, The Ohio State University
The politics of ‘oppositional consciousness’ and ‘Queer Diasporas’ as elucidated by Chela Sandoval and Gayatri Gopinath has come to define a large terrain of feminist and Queer organizing (often loosely defined as “US third world feminisms” and “Queers of Color” critique) in the US/West currently. In this article, I deploy these key concepts to illuminate the resistance mounted against neoliberal citizenship discourses by Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual/Queer (LGBTQ) identified immigrants and international students. In February 2007 a group of about fifty Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer (LGBTQ) and Immigrant rights organizations released the first national "Queer and Transgender Vision Statement on Immigration Reform in the US".

Engendering the Non-Governmental Organization Movement in India
Raili Roy, The Ohio State University
The history of women’s movement in India is rich with debates ranging from women’s participation in political processes to sex-trafficking. This paper analyzes the role of three non-governmental organizations engaged in practices (informed by a set of rhetoric) that seek to emulate a neoliberal form of empowerment for sex workers and survivors of trafficking. This paper departs from a homogenous conceptualization of women’s rights NGOs as primarily agencies for structuring neoliberal consumers, to a more complex conceptualization of NGOs I pay keen attention to the multiple actors (in addition to their rhetoric) within NGOs, the state agencies they interact with, and the women who are defined as "beneficiaries.”

The Validity of One: Radical Interventions in Methodology
Archana A. Pathak, Virginia Commonwealth University
Utilizing Kuhn (1993) & Feyerabend (2010), I posit that the use of science is a political ploy through which we silence the public and shut down competing discourses. This process then becomes the frame through which we further instill a death of diversity through the negation of intellectual diversity, ultimately fostering an inherent structure through which patriarchy and racism become normative. Building on the work of Harding (1991) and González (2003), this paper attempts to articulate a feminist methodological space for the social sciences that is transcendent of dominant articulations of rationalism and logical positivism. Often, even methods that emerge in response to dominant discourses end up recreating the very oppressive structures they aim to dismantle. This essay attempts to offer a radical departure from existing methodological frames.

Feminist Interventions Into the Internet: Being a “Virtual” Woman
Rebecca Johnson, Virginia Commonwealth University
What does it mean to study gender on the internet? Academia has been asking this question since its inception. At first, scholars claimed that the internet was a liberating space where people, especially women, could reinscribe themselves. More recently, however, they have argued that internet users cannot divorce themselves from their bodies. In this paper, I argue for a new way to approach the study of gender on the internet, focusing specifically on blogs.

“I’ve Got This”: Examining the Construction of the “Strong Black Female” Through Social Science Research
Kimberly Lawrence, Virginia Commonwealth University
Since slavery, Black women have been objectified, scrutinized, and minimized in American culture. During the rise of the Women’s and Civil Rights Movements, Black women gained some voice in our culture. While their struggles were beginning to be heard, dominant culture held on to the idea of the Strong Black woman. Most research on Black women reinforces the idea that the Black woman is the matriarch and needs no social support.
This paper attempts to answer the question: To what extent do gender and race norms account for the varying degrees of success and integration of women's studies' concepts and methods in social science research about black women?

Finding Women in the State
Isha Momeni, University of California, Los Angeles

My research examines the relationship between the Iranian state and the Iranian women's rights movement in the past five years, a period in which both the neo-conservative government and the fifth generation of Iranian feminists emerged. This paper seeks to understand if the women's movement has reinforced patriarchal state ideologies or not challenging its power at the base. I seek to understand why Iranian women—citizens who get absolutely no protection from the state—still turn to the state as a possible location of change. The Iranian women's rights movement, breathing silently in the heart of patriarchal state and culture. Instead, the movement has tried to operate within the patriarchal boundaries and the state law and order. Feminists' strategies to survive the oppressive Iranian capitalist-theocratic state have caused backlash from both civil society and sub-groups of the women's rights activists. I will explore whether the compromises made by women's rights activists in Iran to coexist with the state have reproduced and reinforced state patriarchal ideologies and contributed to the State Ideological Apparatus.

Queering Sikh American Women & Visual Representations of Genocide
Gitanjali Kaur Singh, University of California, Los Angeles

Sikh women in the United States hold a socio-political, religious, ethnic and cultural presence in society—these specific spaces include the Indian American community, the diaspora, the gurdwara and the larger, mainstream America. How have Sikh American women become queered by their own patriarchal communities and larger, American mainstream culture while maintaining agency? How do the visual representation of Sikh women then equate as women of color in the United States? I will explore how the 1984 genocide of Sikhs in India in combination with post 9/11 murders of Sikhs impacted the Sikh community in the United States. I will deconstruct the images in the film Amrit and draw on Jahir Puur's Terrorist Assemblies to interrogate these every representations. How does this queering and dislocation of Sikh identity and history then translate to the where Sikh American women are placed in US society? How is Kaju's agency shown through the dream sequences? I will end with investigating the central political possibility of Sikh women in the US.

Cross-Border HIV/AIDS & LGBTQ Education and Activism
Antonio Ortega, Center for Global Education, Augsburg College

This paper will discuss the ways in which a Mexican non-governmental organization (NGO) dedicated to education about HIV/AIDS and LGBTQ rights perceives the challenges and benefits of cross-cultural education and internships. The author, who is one of the organization's founders, argues that both Mexican NGOs and U.S. students and NGOs can benefit from well-designed cross-cultural experiences rooted in transnational feminist and queer pedagogies. Both the Mexican NGO and U.S. students have benefited from dialogue about similarities and differences in U.S. and Mexican activism and community organizing, as well as diverse cultural constructions of sexual identities and language about sexual diversity.

Striving Beyond the Academy for “Cultural Competence” in Activism
Billy Hamilton, Augsburg College

This paper addresses ways in which the author learned to tear down the walls that academia constructed around his ideas of cultural differences. The author will discuss how experiential learning in Mexico revealed his cultural baggage and encouraged him to move beyond ‘cultural competency.’ In doing so, he will draw upon his experiences working with a Mexican women's organization and his coursework with Mexican feminists that underscored the intersectionality of gender, race, class, and nationality. These experiences culminated in shaping his understanding of community outreach and activism with Mexican immigrants in the United States.

Integrative Health Care and Cross-Cultural Health Activism in the Mexican Context
Annica Ren Stull-Lane, Oberlin College

This paper will examine the complexity of health efforts in Mexican communities, focusing on the experiences of female-bodied individuals. To push beyond the academic classroom, evidence will be drawn from experiential learning and oral histories. Health is a multifaceted concept that engages physical, emotional, and spiritual well-being; and is deeply affected by underlying social, economic, environmental, and political contexts. The author will address the ways in which a comprehensive and integrative health care approach involves sustainable healing through combined Western, indigenous, and social medicines. These stories will provide insight into competent cross-cultural health activism in a globalized world.

Latin American Experiences Informing Identity and Activism
Teal Inzunza, Fordham University

Studying abroad in Mexico has helped this author understand her identity as a Mexican American woman and comprehend the atmosphere in which she grew up. Being in Mexico and visiting El Salvador has strengthened her hunger for knowledge about diverse cultural approaches to working with youth involved in gangs. The experiences she has had abroad have given her more tools and passion to create change within populations that she works with in Queens, New York and elsewhere.

Listening to Their Images/Seeing Their Stories: Making Meaning Out of the Photographs of Aging Black Women in Brazil
Celeste Henery, University of Texas, Austin
This paper explores the use of photography to bring aging black Brazilian women and their stories into public and collective memory. The paper traces how the photography included in my ethnographic research in Brazil was a critical factor in the ethnographic exchange, the analysis, representation and storytelling of a group of older black women. As part of a black feminist framework, I consider how the images became a catalyst for re-presenting black women's lives both within and beyond the multiple forms of oppression and how they have contributed to an archive of black women's diasporic practices of transforming memory.

Interpreting El Alma Negra (The Black Soul): Examining the Nation, Blackness, and Womanhood through Photographic Representations of Eusebia Cosme
Takkara Brunson, University of Texas, Austin
An Afro-Cuban woman born in Cuba, Eusebia Cosme relocated to the United States during the late 1930s. She quickly became an internationally renowned performer of "Afro-Antillian" poetry, dressing in elaborate costumes as she recited the works of prominent poets that included Nicolas Guillen, Luis Pales Matos and Langston Hughes. This paper evaluates photographic representations of Cosme and argues that she utilized costumes, poetry, and choreography to construct a gendered and diasporic narrative of blackness. More broadly, this paper considers how the photographs serve as historical evidence for analyzing black women's self-representational practices.

Digitizing Activism and Blackness: Cyber Black Visual Culture Through a Women's Community Based Organization
Juli Grigsby, University of Texas, Austin
Cyberspace's increasing presence in our lives via Web 2.0 vlogs, blogs, chats, tweets, tagged pictures and hyperlinked web pages create an ever-expanding network of representations and identities to unfold. This paper considers Black visual culture in cyberspace within the context of a Los Angeles based women's organization. It suggests these representations are based on an historical continuum of black radical and cultural imagery that digitally forges raced, sexed, and gendered sites of political action. Specifically, it explores how social factors such as funding, membership, and depictions of respectability impact creative interventions in cyber imaginaries.

"All the Women in My Family: Re-Framing the Black Woman Photographer as Archivist, Activist, and Author"
Jacqueline Monique Smith, University of Texas, Austin
This paper examines the ways that Black women artists such as, Renee Cox and Carla Williams, use photography to re-pair, re-imagine, and re-define Black women's histories. I view Cox and Williams as archivists who create, arrange, and preserve experiences by Black women that have been ignored, silenced, or erased in historical records. As such, I explore the multiple ways in which Cox and Williams, as photographers and photographed subjects, respond to the relationship Black women have had to photography, as a technology of surveillance and domination and self-definition and collective transformation

Young Women's Sexual Agency: What does Feminism Have to do with it?
Elisabeth Morgan Thompson, University of Arizona
Narratives from sexually/ethnically diverse young women regarding their same-sex sexual experiences that were/became subject to the "male gaze" show their ambivalent, at best, relationship to their sexual agency. Ironically their identification with feminism contributes to this ambivalence, as feminist identification is more strongly indicative of the recognition of sexual objectification of their bodies than feelings of sexual agency in this context. In this presentation, I will discuss the overwhelming impact of popular culture on young women's everyday experiences and will suggest a new deployment of feminisms by/to young women and girls that aims to (re)claim sexual empowerment in/on their terms.

"Fighting Spirits" and "Warrior Women": Continuity and Transformation in APIA Daughters' Feminist Matrilineal Heritage
Victoria Eunkyoung Nam, University of California, Santa Cruz
Despite the activism of Asian Pacific Islander American (APIA) women in the feminist movement, their presence and contributions have been largely obscured by entrenched stereotypes and other barriers (Chow, 1987). Like many women of color, their feminist consciousness has been shaped within particular social, cultural, and structural contexts. This paper incorporates many interviews with APIA young and adult women about their mother-daughter relationships and their views on gender/feminism. I will demonstrate how daughters' narratives about their mothers' lives and enactments of strength/resistance became critical tools for knowing, feeling, and being 'feminist' from their epistemological standpoints as APIA women (Yee, 2009).

Feminisms in Motion: Girls' Acceptance of Feminist Values and Identities in Junior Roller Derby
Cynthia Lynn Konrad, Purdue University
Indianapolis Junior Roller Derby, a league for girls ages 8-17, is part of the recent popularity of women's roller derby. In this paper, I contest assertions that the sport objectifies women and argue that it and the league employ feminist values, especially around body acceptance and strength. Drawing on interviews about skaters' experiences and reactions to contemporary roller derby films, I explore the effects of these values on the girls and the extent to which they see themselves developing feminisms. I incorporate academic and popular responses to derby, feminist scholarship on girls and sports, and queer scholarship on femme performance.

This intervention combats the homophobia that is present within the gospel music culture.

Nick Cave's "Soundsuits" and The Politics of Queer of Color Life
Freda Fair, University of California, Los Angeles
This paper considers the work of Chicago-based African American performance and visual artist Nick Cave. Cave's "Soundsuits" open up a space to think across the histories of riots in U.S. cities and to do queer and feminist readings of those histories that defy racial, economic, and interethnic competition centered frameworks. In his work, Cave imagines alternative forms of embodiment that remain in conversation with the past and create different ways of visualizing and understanding life. His artistic process speaks to repertoires of politically and historically situated feminist art making practices.

The Performative Is Dead! Long Live Performance!
Katie Rebecca Horowitz, University of California, Berkeley
This paper critiques performativity as it is used in much radical queer and feminist thought of the last twenty years. This usage, I argue, has perpetuated the construction of stage performances as "politics light"—a dilute version of the "real" thing and a lame substitute for "actual" activism. Moreover, it has severely restricted performance's analytic and strategic utility outside the humanities and beyond academia. Synthesizing feminist/scholar scientist Karen Bardin's philosophy with the performance work of genderfuck artists Miko Chan, Filthy Sex Toy, and Donnie Waste, I advance a theory of omnipерformance as a remedy to the abuses of performativity.

Gender in Disaster Management Plan
Sitara Marufjonova Khakimova, State University of New York, Buffalo
Even though gender equality was considered as one of the core domains of social justice and sustainable development, many societies failed in its successful implementation. Unequal access of women to resources and power, their representation in decision-making process is particularly critical in emergency situations. Therefore, this paper suggests the importance to revisit unequal distribution of resources, access and power within family and society that in the worst scenario could negatively affect women's daily survival by analyzing the case of women exclusion in all aspects of disaster management.

The "Women's Empowerment" Emergency Response Program in Post-Tsunami Aceh: Empowering or Disempowering?
Nunung Suliasih Purwaningrum, State University of New York, Buffalo
The tsunami that hit Indonesia in 2004 erased 35 years of political conflict in Aceh. This created a strategic entry point for reorganizing social structure inequality as suggested by disaster scholars but what actually happened in Aceh reveals otherwise. In fact, the disaster strengthened the masculine-oriented socio-political structure. This paper provides lessons learned from the experience of socio-political transition in post-crisis Aceh by analyzing how the deployment of "Women's Empowerment" programs were strategically used to disengage women's organizations from the larger socio-political process despite the abundant resources from post-emergency response funds granted to them.

Feminist Soldiers of Cholera in Zimbabwe
Grace Chobela Mukupa, State University of New York, Buffalo
Since 2000, Zimbabwe has been faced with numerous challenges characterized by a hyperinflationary environment. This paper examines a debate over water crisis in Zimbabwe and how water reforms have impacted women as active agencies within the society. I argue that the water policies have a tendency to neglect the importance of women as water users and productive farmers, an omission that significantly limits the potential effectiveness of water policy reform causing chaos in health institutions.

"None Whose Hearts are Not Ice: Affect, Crisis and Women as Sexual Decoys in 19th Century Florida"
Laurel Clark Shire, University of Hartford

Second Seminole-War-era narratives of white female "suffering" featured black and Seminole violence upon white women and children in Florida. Positioning white women and civilized domesticity as the real victims of war, they used sympathy to justify violent expansion. They also constructed it as a crisis in which "savages" with "hearts of stone" attacked innocent women and children. This presentation argues that white women in frontier Florida were "sexual decoys." At the intersection of gender norms and racial violence, protecting them became a dominant narrative in order to justify a campaign that was really aimed at protecting slavery and removing Indians.

Rehabilitative Reading & Teen Crisis: Entanglements of Disability, Sadness and Citizenship
Julie Passanante Elman, New York University
Policy makers, authors and parents imagine reading as indispensable to producing good youth citizens. Seen as socially-relevant, pedagogical and entertaining, problem novels became the predominant teen literary form. Later, "teen sick lit," emerged as a subgenre, featuring intensely sad romances between a chronically-ill female protagonist and non-disabled boys. Using disability and heterosexual romance, "teen sick lit" cultivated newly valued skills of emotional management and affective labor within the age of emotional IQ and an emergent service economy. This presentation examines the relationship between prescribing "sad literature" as healthy for developing citizens and prescribing healthy norms of citizenship as able-bodied, heterosexual and emotionally-appropriate.

Confronting Ableism: Public Mocking and Regulation of Sexuality
Michael Gill, University of Connecticut
The sexuality of individuals with intellectual disabilities is often seen as threatening, deviant and a type of crisis that ought to be regulated. In the UK a judge ruled that a man with intellectual disabilities should not engage in sexual relations with his male partner because his actions were "inappropriate." Shock-jock Howard Stern regularly mocks people with intellectual disabilities for being sexuality active. These two phenomena reflect an ableist trend to deny the sexual agency of individuals because of assumptions of emotional incapacity. This presentation explores the intersectional ramifications of recognizing the sexual and emotional agency of intellectually-disabled individuals.

Networking Arguments: Towards a Transnational Feminist Rhetorical Pedagogy
Rebecca Dingo, University of Missouri, Columbia
The first paper asserts a pedagogy for humanity scholars wherein writers and students begin to use transnational feminist theoretical models to expand their contextual understandings of complex material conditions. Using the popular text Half the Sky by Kristoff and Wu-Dunn as a foil, Presenter #1 demonstrates how many seemingly transnational texts give a fairly limited view of transnational agency and context that needs to be addressed in the ways we teach and write across the humanities.

Women's Production and Gendered Power: Urban Gardens in Capetown, South Africa
Rachel Claire Riedner, George Washington University
The second paper examines urban gardens created by women responding to the local and global food crisis. Gardens are an opportunity to explore how women shape responses to local conditions, creating alternative economies and ideas of community. Presenter #2 considers how global interests and local conditions affect women and how women make their lives in response to power and inequality. She demonstrates how we might use transnational feminist rhetorical methods to analyze local conditions, global interests, and women's responses to these complex situations.

Discovering Houston: Assembling Local Knowledge in Transnational Networks
Jen L. Wingard, University of Houston
The third paper discusses how location, situation, and context are integral to both rhetorical pedagogy and feminist theory. But how do we insure that we do not create myopic practices and analyses within these explorations of the local? Using location as a means to gather data, anecdote, and observations can connect the practices of theorizing and writing lived experiences. Presenter #3 discusses Houston, TX to show how theorizing specific locations within transnational networks can prevent limited understandings of power across the globe.

(Dis)Ability in Early Feminism: How Feminist Arguments for Gender Equality Undermine Feminist Critiques of Social Exclusion
Meredith Minor, Southern Methodist University
First-wave feminists attempted to dispute male privilege and advocate for female equality by arguing that women are just as capable as men. This argument assumed the superiority of able-bodiness to disability. This presentation explores the rhetoric of ability in first wave feminism in order to create a foundation for alternative ways of establishing the equality of men and women. If contemporary women's studies scholars hope to transform the field of women's studies toward the goal of social justice, we must deal with this history which has argued for women's rights on the assumed social exclusion of disabled bodies.

Irregular Embodiment: Anomalous Bodies, Suffering Bodies in Self-Narrative
Charlotte Loftus, Independent Scholar
Contemporary women's narratives of disability and disease illuminate rifts between disabled and non-disabled feminists in activist and academic circles. Narratives of irregular embodiment calls to account feminist theory that has dismissed the corporeality of anomalous, suffering, and diseased bodies. If there is to be more than a token participation by disabled people... n feminism and women’s studies, these dialogues have to begin at traditional accommodations such as wheelchair access and ASL interpreters, rather than end there. Acknowledging the differing experiences of power and embodiment, feminism and women’s studies needs to be informed by the reality of disabled bodies.

Julie Dash’s Optic of US Slavery and US Settler Colonialism: Visualizing Methods for Intersectional Work
Tiffany Lethabo King, University of Maryland, College Park
This paper brings settler colonial logics that are primarily concerned with the Native body and land into the same frame as the coloniality of slavery that regulates the Black body. By examining Julie Dash’s iconic scenes of slavery in the film Daughters of the Dust, I would like to disrupt one of the visual regimes or contracts (Wahab, 2008:1) of colonialism which would suggest that settler colonialism and the coloniality of US slavery are complementary yet non-intersecting formations. I argue that Dash’s optic of the indigo stained hand provides us with an opportunity to blur the boundaries of colonial formations.

Linda Strong Leek, Berea College
The novel, The Help, has reopened a conversation which many African American women scholars hoped was permanently put to rest. However, the immensely popular book continues to insist that African American women unatly desire to nurture white children, remain child-like and docile, even in light of, and probably in direct response to, the new African American woman, like First Lady, Michelle Obama. In this instance, the old “master’s tools” of racism within supposedly “feminist” readings of the American female experience have been resurrected to illustrate that ultimately, African American women’s role will forever remain within the servant class.

This Book is an Action: The Politics of Feminist Publishing
Jennifer Gilley, Penn State University
Despite what Florence Howe calls a “symbiotic relationship” between women’s studies and feminist publishing, this area has yet to be subject to any critical analysis. How has the book publishing industry affected what gets published, thereby influencing the direction of feminist ideologies? What constitutes “success” in feminist publishing: the small press publication of radical new voices or mainstream press distribution of feminist ideas? I will explore these questions by analyzing the publication histories of Sisterhood is a Powerful, Lesbian Nuns, and an unpublished Third Wave anthology, in order to complicate the relationship between commerce and political purity in feminist publishing.

War and Justice Transformed by Indigenous Women in Leslie Marmon Silko’s Novel Almanac of the Dead
Cambria Stamper, Arizona State University
This paper examines how Sista II Sista’s dual system of “taking power” and “making power” as explained by Andrea Smith can help analyze indigenous women’s actions of preparing for war in Leslie Marmon Silko’s novel Almanac of the Dead. This project also relies on Linda Tuihawai Smith’s work Decolonizing Methodologies: Research and Indigenous Peoples, and the strategy of “Indigenizing” (146-147). By querying the intersections of women’s voices, indigeneity, and the history of violence and injustice in Silko’s novel, we can examine how indigenous women recast the “Master’s Tools” of war-making.

Disrupting the Meta-Narrative: Theorizing Feminist Methodology through Artistic Practice
Annika Corwin Speer, University of California, Santa Barbara
The play Jane emerges from interviews with women involved with Chicago’s pre-Roe abortion referral service as well as women helped by the service. By privileging a multiplicity of accounts, and rejecting the notion of metanarratives, documentary theatre highlights social issues with an attention to complexity and transparency. Documentary theatre is itself a method; it employs numerous techniques similar to research—conducting interviews, collecting oral histories, and sifting through these dialogues—in order to construct a narrative. In this paper, I argue for the potential documentary theatre holds as a feminist method and thus an interdisciplinary tool for education and activism.

Communication and Practical Theory: Sites of Dialogue Among the Academy, the Arts, and the Community
Amanda Denes, University of California, Santa Barbara
Challenging the activism/academy and theory/practice divides, this paper analyzes the collaborative production of Jane through a Communication Studies lens. The concept of “practical theory” (Barge, 2001) explores the use of language between collaborators inside the academy and out, highlighting the intersections of theory and practice. Using this framework to better understand the role of communication in collaborative work, I explore the dynamics of feminist collaboration from a new and inter-disciplinary vantage point. The production of Jane serves as a prime example of the importance of creative endeavors as sites of dialogue among the academy, the arts, and the community.

Shared Spaces and Shared Positionalities: Using Performance to Address Discourses of Multi-Generational Feminist Divides
Carly Ann Thomsen, University of California, Santa Barbara
This paper challenges the narrative that young women are uninvolved with contemporary feminist struggles by engaging the following questions: What constitutes activism? How do definitions of “knowledge” and “activism” shift when we centralize contemporary cultural production rather than historical political events? How do concepts of legacy, “truth” and memory influence activists of different generations? Our research shows that audience members of all ages knew little to nothing about “The Jane Collective” prior to attending the Jane play. I argue that this shared positionality creates a space through which the cultural narrative that pits younger versus older can be critiqued.

Same Mammie Different Queenie: Race, Place, and Gender in The Curious Case of Benjamin Button (2008)
Diana Martha Louis, Emory University
This paper analyzes The Curious Case of Benjamin Button (2008). Although it will likely be remembered as fantasy love story, the film attempted to deploy a new understanding of black femininity in the character of Queenie. I argue that it exemplifies the way American society constantly revises yet retains the Mammy figure as a vital part of its own fanciful imagination. By focusing on depictions of Queenie, an African-American woman in a New Orleans nursing home, I consider how race, place, and time offer new insights. Ultimately, I contend this fictional depiction implicitly fuels physical and emotional violence against women.

"Every Thug Needs a Lady": Reading the Rap Gangstress in the Disciplinary-Patriarchal State
Chanel Craft, Emory University
An understanding of the crisis of mass incarceration in the gendered-carceral state requires an analysis of the nexus of discipline and patriarchy. To reveal this coupling, this paper analyzes discourses in rap lyrics that construct a female gangster identity I term the Bonne Myth, narratives of women incarcerated for drug related offenses, and war on drug sentencing policies to highlight how a disciplinary-patriarchal state creates intersections of violence for women of color. Using hip-hop feminist theory I examine how circulated representations of the black female gangstress upheld by patriarchy create consequences for these women in the juridical system.

Hide Ya Kids, Hide Ya Wife and Hide Ya Husbands 'Cause They Rapin' Erbody Out Here: Blackness, Gender, Class and Appropriation in Popular Culture and the Media
Gabriel Peoples, University of Maryland, College Park
Sexual violence has historically been silenced in Black communities due to the racial violence that they systematically encounter, which already labels them as promiscuous and violent. Antoine Dodson becomes celebritized after telling the news that there was a rapist on the loose that sexually assaulted his sister. His refusal to remain silent creates space to talk about hetero/homosexual violence in Black communities, while his sister's experience is silenced. The unraveling of this performance through mass media and popular music urges understanding the ways in which race, gender, appropriation, homophobia and comedy interplay in the performance and its re-presentations.

Then, I will deduce why.

 Whose Breasts Are They?: The Social Construction of Gender and Sexuality through Breast Feeding Campaigns
Jennifer Rothchild, University of Minnesota, Morris; Alissa Hawks, University of Minnesota Morris; Alicia E. Johnson, University of Minnesota Morris
This paper examines the social constructions of gender and sexuality in breastfeeding advocacy programs. Specifically, this project addresses the questions: For breastfeeding mothers, who "owns" her breasts? Are they hers? Her partner's? Her baby's? Whose breasts are they? How do these advocacy programs reinforce gender constructs? Might these campaigns help women empower themselves? Through an evaluation study of a breastfeeding campaign in the Midwest, this paper troubles the predominant discourse on "motherhood" and "baby-friendly" practices. Findings from this study not only inform our understanding of gender and sexuality constructs, but also reveal innovative approaches to infant feeding through women's empowerment.

Rethinking Sexual Freedom: The Asexual Movement and the Sex Wars
Megan Elizabeth Milks, University of Illinois at Chicago
The rhetoric of sexual liberation that solidified from the sex wars of the 80s and early 90s into a limited empowered versus repressed binary has, within contemporary sex-positive feminism, morphed into a new binary: subversive versus conservative. Within the framework of these binaries, asexuality has been considered always already repressed and conservative. But what happens when asexuality is no longer considered repressed? This paper asks in what ways the emergence of the asexual community compels a reconfiguration of the rhetoric of sexual liberation in the context of contemporary sex-positive feminism.

The Spectacular Asexual: Queer Desire, Visibility, and the Asexual Body
Karli June Cerankowski, Stanford University
In their FAQ, the Asexual Visibility and Education Network (AVEN) takes an ambivalent stance on the question of whether asexuality is queer; they restrict their answer to individual self-identification. In this paper, I suggest that rather than focusing on identity, we can get at the stakes of AVEN's politics by examining how asexuality demands that we think more queerly about what constitutes queer desires and pleasures. Doing so also requires interrogating a politics based on visibility, as I examine the ways in which the asexual body becomes a fetish object or spectacle and requires new conceptualizations of queer visibility.

Ace Ideas: Asexuality and the Abolition of Whiteness
Ianna Hawkins Owen, University of California, Berkeley

Crippling Asexuality: Definitional Stress and Its Discontent
Eunjung Kim, University of Wisconsin

The public emergence of individuals who identify as asexual challenges the notions of the pervasiveness and naturalness of sexuality and provides a unique opportunity to explore the negotiation of identity and embodiment, yet this effort is burdened with permanency tests, empirical focus, and the rush to normal. This presentation explores the place of asexuality in social theory that examines the interworkings of compulsory able-bodiedness and heterosexuality and considers the space of discussing asexuality beyond definitional emphasis in scientific frameworks and identity politics. Asexuality further pressures the act of crippling itself, the claiming of disability and queer identities.

What is ‘Feminist’ Knowledge about Violence
Lisa Catherine Knisely, Emory University

In this paper, I explore what is necessary for some knowledge to be intelligible as “feminist” by examining how “feminist” knowledge stands in shifting and contentious relation to “non-feminist” knowledge. Arguments about what is essential for some knowledge to be considered feminist are structured by debates over the sameness or difference, not of women, but of feminist scholarship itself. In this paper, I argue that the “violence against women” approach has become conventionalized as the feminist approach to violence, while Women’s Studies scholars largely ignore other feminist approaches to understanding violence, such as those generated in philosophy.

Deploying and Disciplining Feminism: Debating “Undoing” Gender
Brandi Simula, Emory University

This paper explores the deployment of feminism across disciplinary boundaries, taking as an example conversations about the possibilities of “undoing” gender currently taking place in both Women’s Studies and Sociology (e.g. Butler 2004, Deutsch 2007, Risman 2009, West and Zimmerman, 2009). I explore the extent to which these conversations overlap and suggest that the disciplinary boundaries drawn around these conversations impede the development of feminist scholarship in both fields. I analyze the meanings and uses of “feminism” within and across these conversations and argue that the deployment of feminism differs significantly in each case.

Reclaiming American Regionalism: Zitkala-Ša’s Ecofeminist Vision
Esther Maria Lopez, Georgia College & State University
Feminist critics have transformed our understanding of American literary regionalism. However, the inclusion of ethnic writers in the American literature canon brought new challenges. How does one categorize a text that does not fit existing definitions of regionalism, like Zitkala-Ša’s Old Indian Legends (1901)? The multiethnic canon has also caused scholars to reconceptualize environmental writing. I explore how an ecofeminist approach to Old Indian Legends expands our understanding of regionalism. Since regionalists were curious and apprehensive about social change, I also analyze Zitkala-Ša construction of national identity. Examining Zitkala-Ša’s conceptions of women, region, and nature helps us rethink them today.

We’ve Been Studied to Death, We Ain’t Gotten Anything: (Re)claiming Knowledge Production Through Writing Collectives

This presentation engages critically with a collective writing project of a consortium of stakeholders from a university and a group of African-American women from the Newtown Florist Club (NFC) in Gainesville, Georgia. This presentation addresses the challenges of writing collectives in general, and highlights specific challenges and solutions developed by the Newtown Florist Club Writing Collective.

Whose Science?: Master Narratives of Science and Science Learning in Contemporary Native American Communities

Hosted by the Mashantucket Pequot Museum & Research Center from 2004-2007, this grant sought to engage middle-school age Native and non-Native youth in informal science learning through archaeology. This paper will focus on the evaluation methodologies constructed by the consulting firm for Zuni and Mashantucket, and conclusions drawn about student learning through those partnerships.

Re-privileging Boundaries: the Discourse of the Nation-State in Global and Transnational Feminism Studies
Kristin Marie Alder, University of North Texas
Despite beliefs that the power of nation-states has de-centered in the face of globalization, post-liberal, post-modern, and post-structuralist perspectives feminists cannot overlook both the theoretical and practical ways in which the state and the subject are mutually constitutive (Beck 2000, Otto 1996, Rai 2008). Building on the theories of Michel Foucault, Horri K. Bhabha, Benedict Anderson, and Judith Butler, this paper analyzes the implications of naming upon subjectivity and agency. Whether the movement be “global” or “transnational,” engagement with the state, both in theory and praxis, is not optional.

Revolutions are Never Safe: Deconstructing the Notion of Women’s Studies Classes as “Safe Spaces.”
Susan Blanche Harper, Texas Woman's University
Drawing on bell hooks’ assertion that learning is a revolutionary act, the author analyzes what feminist pedagogy means when it declares Women's Studies classrooms “safe.” This paper asserts that, while Women’s Studies classrooms must be environments safe for open expression, the very nature of the subject matter means that students will be exposed to ideas that challenge and possibly offend, exposing them to intellectual and/or emotional risk. Further, how does a focus on “safety” in the classroom potentially sacrifice academic rigor and opportunities for real learning?

Feminist Research as Social Therapy: Should Feminist Research Be Therapeutic?
Sara Alicia Cooley, University of California, Santa Barbara
Feminist Research is complex, interdisciplinary, and defined in different ways and incorporates techniques and methods from other disciplines. While many feminist academics balance the two worlds of academia and activism, the issue of conducting ethical research with diverse individuals becomes an issue of defining ourselves and understanding our own motivations. While issues relating to objectivity and subjectivity remain, allowing activism to influence a research project can result in what Daphne Patai has called “Savage Social Therapy.” This paper seeks to address the ways in which Feminist Research balances the ethics of research and activism within a therapeutic framework.

374. Nurturing Communities: The Role of Feminist Working Groups in Professional and Personal Edification
8:00 to 9:15 am • Level 2: Valdosta
The Feminist Working Group Initiative (FWGI) is a small national group of feminist philosophers who are committed to supporting each other personally and professionally. This group was born from coincidence, but continues through choice and collaboration. The methods developed by FWGI can be useful for women in the academy in any discipline striving to build supportive alliances and networks.

The Politics of Being Seen: The Case of the Wednesday Demonstrations
Min-Ah Cho, Emory University
This paper examines the past, present and future in "comfort women" scholarship and activism of the weekly demonstration held in Seoul, outside the Japanese Embassy. Along with re-evaluating the significance of the demonstration for its educational and networking potential, I suggest its drawbacks and the challenges that lie ahead. What have we learned from nineteen years of Wednesday demonstrations? What does this form of activism say about the gaps between being seen and being real?

Picturing Hers: Memory of Survivors of Japanese Military Sexual Slavery in Asian American Arts
Joo Young Lee, Emory University
This paper examines why and how Asian American artists have documented oral histories and memories of the "comfort women" of World War II. While the paper analyzes a variety of texts—including novels, poems, films, photographs, and paintings, created by Asian American artists/activists—the presenter's short documentary film records these artists' own history of activism.

To Remember or to Mourn?: The Gender Politics of War Deaths
You-me Park, Georgetown University
This paper compares the politics of nationalized deaths, as exemplified both by the infamous and controversial Yasukuni Temple in Japan, where the country's war dead are worshipped, and by the annual shamanistic rituals held in Korea to placate the spirits of "comfort women." The presenter argues for the need to move beyond the cultural politics of "remembrance," where the memories of the dead are safely subsumed in the dominant system of thought. Rather, we need to explore and pursue the political potentials of inevitably impossible "mourning" (or "midmourning," to borrow Jacques Derrida's phrase) in which irrevocable, singular losses of human lives humble us and fundamentally change the ways we understand ourselves and the world.

Robo-Divas: Black Female Cyborgs in Popular Culture
Sine Caputi, Florida Atlantic University; Sika Dagbovie, Florida Atlantic University
Representations of black female cyborgs abound in popular culture, music videos, and concert performances. We are interested in the intersections between race and gender these engage. How do the recent cyborg images of black divas (Beyoncé, Janelle Monae, Erykah Badu) critique or trouble and raise what black female bodies historically have symbolized? Is this figure a harbinger of a new paradigm of postmodern and radically revised subjectivity, a liberatory "mythtype" invoking Africana divinity, or a symbolic throwback, communicating what Collins calls the "new racism."

Toward a Feminist Funny: Exploring Myth, Power and Postfeminism in the Work of Chelsea Handler
Lauren Ann Walleser, Florida Atlantic University
Chelsea Handler is a comedian, three-time New York Times bestselling author, and host of the E! Network late night talk show Chelsea Lately. As the first truly successful female late night talk show host in the male-dominated genre, she appears to break away from traditional feminism while also playing along with patriarchal themes in order to gain and maintain her foothold in the genre. In my paper, I analyze Handler's work, exploring the line she toes between feminism and postfeminism, and examining popular and mythic image types she deploys in order to appeal to female and gay male audiences.

Cinematic Autoeroticism and Feminism: Exploring Power and Agency in Depictions of Female Masturbation
Megan Tomei, Florida Atlantic University
Historically, female masturbation has led to women's imprisonment, torture, shame and labeling as insane and perverse. Although these ideas have slowly eroded, there is still stigma attached to the act. Autoeroticism is an act that offers agency and sexual fulfillment for women outside of patriarchal sex roles that, as Dworkin and Foucault have asserted, dehumanize women. The act clearly possesses great power, but does this translate on the screen? This article looks at multiple films to see how historical notions are being reinscribed as well as films that are challenging this and offering new ways of looking at female masturbation.

Sex, Stereotypes and Stigma: Exploring Representations of HIV/AIDS in Queen Latifah's "Life Support."
Monica L. Melton, Spelman College
HIV/AIDS complicates the lives of some African American women who comprise 55.7% of new infections (CDC, 2006). Given the plethora of digital imagery from social media to hand held digital electronic devices, why aren't prevention messages connecting with African American women? In the HBO movie "Life Support," Queen Latifah plays the protagonist Ana. A movie based upon the real life story of a mother, a former crack addict, and AIDS activist. I will tease out issues of gender, race, class, as they relate to HIV/AIDS prevention interventions and portrayal of the black body.

When Demand Exceeds Supply: Disaster Response and the Southern Political Economy
Lynn Weber, University of South Carolina
Since the political realignment of the 1980s, the South has led the nation in implementing conservative economic and social policies: privatization of government functions, reduced taxes for the wealthy, deregulation, deep cuts in social spending. These policies, along with a Southern legacy of extreme race, class, and gender inequality defined the context of reception for Katrina evacuees throughout the region. Based on 90 interviews and documentary evidence this paper describes the context in Columbia, South Carolina as particularly harsh, especially for women-headed families, and characterized by: affordable housing shortages, lack of public transportation, punitive and restricted welfare benefits, limited employment opportunities, and racial and cultural conflict.
"We Need to Get Together With Each Other": Women's Narratives of "Help" in Katrina’s Displacement
Jacqueline Litt, Rutgers University
This paper describes an evacuation chain created by low-income African American women which resulted in S4 New Orleanians—including family members, friends, and acquaintances—surviving Katrina in a two bedroom duplex in Baton Rouge. The story reveals how women’s informal carework was a significant safety net for evacuees. While evacuees sought and used formal institutions of assistance for food and other expenses, a norm of care among women dominated the evacuees’ responses to kin members’ needs. Networks expanded to meet the needs of individuals not yet part of the circle, and caregiving came to constitute the identity of the network anchors.

Katrina Evacuee Reception in Rural East Texas: The Limits of Empathy
Lee Miller, Sam Houston State University
Based on research in Huntsville, Texas with community leaders responsible for managing the sheltering and assistance efforts for evacuees, this paper documents the challenges that scarce resources posed for a receiving community and the displaced who landed in it. It further illustrates how leaders’ attitudes toward the displaced shifted over time from welcome to suspicion to overt hostility—and how these feelings were shaped by race, class, and gender stereotypes. Community leaders expected that after a short time, people should be self-sufficient (no matter what their pre-disaster circumstances), suggesting that empathy is a time-limited, raced, classed, and gendered phenomenon.

After the Flood: Faith and the Diaspora
Pam Jenkins, University of New Orleans
Drawing on interviews with 30 displaced men and women in Baton Rouge, this paper presents a picture of the meaning and function of Black churches for displaced persons. Years after the storm, facing still uncertain futures, displaced people's greatest expressed need was for spiritual support in community. Connecting with a new "home church" in Baton Rouge helped women, in particular, reestablish old community ties, feel some continuity with the past, and develop new ties in Baton Rouge. Men were more likely to turn to the church for material support, but they too found a sense of community through their new church.

Hurricane Katrina resulted in one of the largest and most abrupt evacuations in U.S. history. Nearly one and a half million people left home for at least a short span of time, and hundreds of thousands of them are still displaced and facing ever diminishing prospects for an eventual return. This panel includes four presenters and features the work of a collaborative of twelve feminist social scientists who devoted the past five years to field research on displaced people in thirteen different communities across the country.

378. Enacting Inclusion: Centering Disability in Women’s and Gender Studies Courses
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Atlanta 4 - AV
This workshop will help instructors to move beyond merely “adding on” questions of disability—whether in terms of pedagogical method or course content—toward the centering of disability as a starting point for pedagogical engagement. Bridging the work of critical disability studies and the principles of Universal Design for Learning (UDL), we will examine the ways in which such an intentional centering of “disability” in our pedagogical and content decisions can improve learning for all students and enhance understanding of and appreciation for embodied and cognitive diversity.

The Social and Economic Characteristics of African American Women with Disabilities
Angel Love Miles, University of Maryland, College Park
African American women with disabilities have one of the highest rates of disability in the nation, yet are far less likely to have access to the same social and economic resources as their white able bodied counterparts (Smart and Smart, 1997; Beatty, 2003; Alston et al. 2003). This talk will provide a brief introduction to where African American women tend to be located in society as a demographic, and an argument for why women’s studies should be the academic and activist space at the forefront for addressing their needs.

Critically Engaging Ableism
Pushpa Naidu Parekh, Spelman College
Inspired by Charles Mills’ The Racial Contract, this presentation will discuss the value of “contract theory” in engaging critically with ableism and ableist contracts. Like racist, sexist and homophobic contracts, ableist contracts are domination/exclusivist contracts that “normative” signatories, whether explicitly or implicitly, enter into and thus enable domination to become entrenched “in the structures of institutions, cultural practices and individual psychologies” (Haslanger). Unpacking the mechanisms of this contract allows us to break silence around ableist practices and their intersections which are an ongoing and destabilizing process for women of color, disability rights activists, as well as educators.

380. Power, Privilege, and Politics: Exploring Identity in Classroom and Community Activism
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Augusta
From questions about the role of men in the feminist movement to the interchangeable roles of professor/activist, this roundtable explores the challenges and opportunities of situated perspective and personal politics in the collaboration between the academy, students, and community activists. Based on their work in the classroom and out, participants engage in and invite dialogue that contextualizes the activist aspects of women's studies within personal identity and concepts of power, privilege, and coalition-building.

Participants will explore discourses around such subdisciplines and how Women's Studies can thrive by integrating such areas. Participants will also explore the importance of curriculum offerings utilizing service-learning around global topics in a local fashion, citing a project undertaken with migrant farmworker women in the US and the importance of continuing the dialogue on white privilege using a funded research project on the invisible ink of white privilege as examples.

PARTICIPANTS:
Addressing Inequalities of Race and Class in a Service Learning Course
Linda Burns, Carlow University
This case study focuses on the service learning course Inequalities of Race and Class. University students engage in service at a community arts center in an inner-city neighborhood where art programs aim to provide high school students with skills, hope, and inspiration to reach their full potential. This experiential dimension is consistent with feminist pedagogy as students move beyond the boundaries of their university to assist in the arts studios and engage with youth in mentoring relationships. Through this course students gain a more tangible understanding of problems and solutions related to issues of inequality based on race and class.

Voice, Inclusion, and Interdependence: The Youth Media Advocacy Project as Feminist Pedagogy
Jennifer Snyder-Duch, Carlow University
The Youth Media Advocacy Project aims to empower students in urban public high schools to express their views on education reform through the local media. Within a service-learning course, undergrads work with high school students to develop media advocacy campaigns. The course is consistent with feminist pedagogy because it extends beyond the classroom walls and engages students in community work; empowers college students and teens by teaching advocacy skills; values the personal experiences and competencies of those involved and the importance of giving voice to the disenfranchised; and emphasizes the interdependent relationships necessary to produce social change.

Beyond University Walls and National Borders: Service Learning in Jamaica
Melissa Swayger, Indiana University of Pennsylvania
The Jamaica Service-Learning program combines study abroad with service, traditional and non-traditional classroom instruction, and cultural immersion in the rural sugar farming community of Petersfield, Jamaica. The five week program includes homestays, collaboration in community-driven service, shared learning, and intense reflection. Consistent with feminist pedagogy, learning moves from the classroom to community as students engage in dialogue with citizens about their experience and resistance of globalization. As students develop mutually enriching relationships with community members and each other, they reflect on their privileges, critically analyze their place as global citizens, and embrace the importance of local and global action.

383. Bodies Matter: The Impacts of Theories of the Body in Feminist Discourse
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 12
This roundtable initiates a conversation about theories of the body and their implications for feminist scholarship. The roundtable participants discuss how theories of body relate to the relationships between race, gender, class, and sexuality. Grounded in feminist, postcolonial, and law and society research, theories of the body allow scholars to discuss an emerging political activism. This roundtable, scholars center bodily regulation in order to discuss a variety of topics, including slave rebellions, motherhood, critical whiteness studies, and the creation of the “homosexual.” This conversation explores the scholarly potential of attention to the body in future research.

Teaching Gender When There is No Gender to Teach: Exploring the Opportunities and Challenges for Teaching Gender at Liberal Arts Colleges
Josephine J. Dawuni, Georgia Gwinnett College
This paper examines the opportunities and challenges for integrating women's studies and gender issues into college classrooms where there is no specific focus on gender both at the college-wide level and within individual courses. This paper revisits bell hooks' Teaching to Transgress which among other things seeks to focus on making the classroom "the most radical space of possibility in the academy." Using interviews from feminist scholars in a newly created liberal arts college, this paper will explore both the challenges and opportunities for feminist scholars in teaching introductory social science courses when there is no gender and women's studies center at the College.
Women, Diversity, Immigration and Higher Education: The Contribution of Service Learning Towards an Equal Education
Donna Abrams, Georgia Gwinnett College

This paper seeks to examine the contributions of service-based and community learning and how their engagement provides a blended academic experience for women. It also seeks to examine how female immigrants experience equality in higher education and learning. Diversity refers to a host of characteristics that include race, class, gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, religion, political affiliation, and inclusion of other populations. Institutions of higher education have integrated voices and experiences of various underrepresented cultures and excluded groups in their curriculum. The social action approach will be used to understand and explain inclusion.

Feminist Intersectionality in Political Science Classes
Dovile Budryte, Georgia Gwinnett College

The proposed presentation will focus on the following question: How to create a "transformative classroom" (James A. Banks's term) which fosters global awareness and empowers the students with different backgrounds to understand power structures? Theoretically, the project is grounded in the intersectionality literature which explores teaching strategies that address how complex variables such as global developments, linguistic differences, ethnicity, gender, and national identity combine to determine an individual's fate in a global context. The presentation will focus on an overview of specific strategies to create a transformative classroom used in introductory undergraduate political science and international studies courses. This paper is grounded in the works of Nira Yuval Davis's work on nations and nationalism, Kimberlé Crenshaw's examination of the overlap of several systems of oppression (gender, race, class) in her study of feminist and anti-racist movements.

Navigating Positive Change: Gender-Based Initiatives in Ghana's Higher Education
Tina Adusah-Karikari, Ghana Institute of Management and Public Administration

This paper examines strategies adopted by a public university in Ghana to embark on the journey of transformation into a gender-sensitive and gender-responsive institution. Through different qualitative inquiry, the paper explores positive strides embarked on, such as the establishment of a Gender Center and gender policy and mainstreaming gender into curricula. Findings suggest that we as feminists constantly need to find innovative strategies to navigate the process of transformation since the patriarchal culture of the universities continues to undermine women’s authority, space, and frame their identity in subordinated paradigms. Based on bell hooks tenets, we need to find ways of being radical, yet transformative.

9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 1: Georgia 14

This four-person roundtable investigates the disconnect between being a “good” academic and a “good” feminist. Each recognizes the importance of taking our professional work beyond the walls of the academy, but we also must contend with the expectations of our respective institutions and our shared field. After blazing the trail for us, our mother's tongues have often turned on junior academics for not doing the “real” work of the field -- traditional scholarship. This roundtable discusses with both graduate students and faculty how to do the work that should be done without being professionally penalized.

Transgressing Domesticity: (Re) negotiating Self-Identity in Rabindranath Tagore's Strir Patra or A Wife's Letter
Suchismita Banerjee, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee

Written in 1914, Tagore's Strir Patra or A Wife's Letter makes critical intervention in redefining selfhood in the late colonial period of Renaissance Bengal. Creating an unlikely space for feminist consciousness, this short story recounts the domestic oppression of married women within the upper class, Hindu patriarchal framework. Marginalized by gender, lack of education and access to resources, and the formation of a "new patriarchy" countering Western ideals of modernity, the women of this short story lead a life of silence and accepted submission. Amidst this hegemonic complicity, Mrinal, the middle wife of the Hindu joint family, writes a letter much like Ibsen's Nora and leaves home with her cousin to refashion her identity, carve out a space of her own, and to inculcate a spiritual reawakening in her private sphere that is no longer defined by the dictates of her husband but by her own understanding of self.

Indian Feminism, Feminisms in India and the Internet: New Media as New Agency?
Debajni Chakravarty, Arizona State University

My paper examines how the internet is being increasingly mobilized as a site and space for feminist activism in India. While questions of access and technology integration remain when one considers internet usage in India it is still an exciting terrain, unbound by time and space and manifesting contemporary Indian feminist intervention, or women's activism (to represent those who "shun" feminism as an alien and/or inappropriate expression). Looking at three spaces, one that firmly proclaims an Indian feminist position (Ultraceuticals) and a third that publishes articles that embrace and denounce feminism—both nominally and essentially (Countercurrents), I analyze the nature of new media as a kind of queer, hybrid intersubjective space of mediation where the self (or selves) exist as textual body, taking on a virtual identity, becoming what Butler called "subjects of desire" emerging within discourses that do not always follow the rules of conventional epistemic production. Thus this space provides rich possibilities of performance of national and gender identities, justice and feminisms.

It discusses Palestinian art, music, and cinema that focus on the distinctive situation of Palestinian women in the aftermath of the Israeli apartheid. The paper also reads posters and graffiti by women and centered around women as social texts of Palestinian resistance. Finally, transnational Empowered Food Security: Creative Approaches to Food Pantry Operation
Alicia Woodbury, Arizona State University
Creative forms of activism in food pantry spaces are increasing household food security by empowering women (and men) in specifically material ways. In contrast to the majority of emergency food providers—which operate under the model of “take what you are given”—this research uses case studies to highlight food pantries which are combating household food insecurity by increasing participants’ ability to grow their own food, their nutritional knowledge and food preparation skills, and their overall sense of ownership in the community’s food security efforts. Although not always explicitly identified as feminist, the pantries discussed in this project demonstrate a concern for the role women play in achieving food security, religious and ethnic diet diversity, and the centrality of personal and community empowerment in achieving social justice and social change. Drawing from website analysis, phone interviews, and on-site visits, this paper discusses the ways in which non-traditional emergency food security practices are, and are not, understood as feminist, and how the values and practices of model operations can inform and increase the effectiveness of food security efforts more broadly.

Challenging Tradition to Transform Society: Community-Based Tanzanian Women's Group Leaders and Transnational Feminism
Amanda Filipczuk-Baker, Towson University
This paper discusses the links between Transnational Feminism, transformational leadership, and community-based Tanzanian women’s group leaders. Transnational Feminism has increasingly focused on experiences of women in the global South to complement discourse. Concurrently, the establishment of women’s groups across the ‘South’ has erupted. In the United Republic of Tanzania, there are numerous community-based women’s groups which are led, mostly, by local people. These leaders promote a variety of women’s issues and are transforming gender relations in their communities through their work. Findings from field research analysis determines these leaders are transformational agents of Transnational Feminism.

Women’s Studies with (in and out) the Walls Experience from Thailand

According to colonial process, colonialism remains and continues to disseminate itself through a complex system of power relations, especially through systems of thought and knowledge production sustaining relations of unequal social power. By retrieving what remains “suppressed” and therefore subversive and “dangerous” to the maintenance of the colonial process, both perspectives open and make room not only for reconsidering but also decolonizing the colonial process as the ruling system.

A Spectrum of Intersectionalities: Latin American Immigrant Women in South Florida
Elena Sabogal, William Paterson University
This paper seeks to understand the key political and economic factors that propel the migration of Latin American women to South Florida. The migration of women from different social classes deeply structure and affect their life chances. Several variables will be analyzed to determine variability for female immigrant populations in South Florida. In this context, immigration allows the full spectrum of intersectionalities to emerge. While in some instances, women are compelled to change the values they had brought with them, immigrant women in South Florida transform and simultaneously acquire new perspectives about themselves and the lives they left behind.

Creating Oneself: The Feminist Potential in Assuming a Roller Derby Identity
Rachel Erice Nickens, University of Cincinnati
Since the revival of women's roller derby in the early 2000s, the sport has occupied a unique spot in contemporary women's culture. This roundtable will feature brief presentations on concrete strategies for introducing feminist politics, gender and sexuality issues, and critical pedagogy to students in lower-division required courses in the humanities. We will discuss syllabus design, text selection, assignment creation, and self-presentation, keeping in mind the expectations and requirements departments and students have for required courses. Presenters will share resources with attendees, and all participants are encouraged to bring experiences and ideas for teaching core classes from a feminist perspective to the discussion.

395. Tools of the Trade: Mastering Methodologies while Complicating Subversion
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Savannah 1

PARTICIPANTS:
Anthropology, Bourdieu, and Black Lesbian Social Networks
Nikki Lane, American University

This paper interrogates the meaning of the "master's tools" in the context of Anthropology, a discipline steeped in the history of colonialization, racialization, and racism. Using ethnographic data about the social networks of Black lesbians in the urban cityscape, I utilize Bourdieu's concepts of cultural and social capital (briefly addressing the strong feminist critique of Bourdieu), I problematize what it might mean to assign the label of "master" on toolkits which while problematic perhaps in their inception and sometimes in their application, may offer some insight to the feminist project more broadly.

Can the Subaltern Blog?: An Exploration of Gender in Blogging, Representation, and Global Capital
Sarah Carnahan, The Ohio State University

Building on Spivak's timeless question, "Can the subaltern speak?" this paper explores the opportunities and challenges of blogging as it relates to the speaking potential of subaltern women. Blogging can afford those women with access an archival, distributable voice. Yet, when blogs become books, subaltern women's voices are still mediated by globalized, capitalist circulation. This paper focuses on two blogs-turned-books - Baghdad Burning and Iraq Girl - in order to explore blogs' possibilities and limitations for agency and self-representation. These works provide ample fodder to unpack questions of representation and the "speaking" subaltern.

Bound by the IRB: The Terrorization of Critical Scholarship
Jenny D. Grubbs, American University

Institutional loopholes impede critical research from being done and serve as "master tools" to discourage both collaboration and praxis. Specifically, the IRB process fragments academics into neoliberal individuals bound by the politics of pedagogical respectability. This paper examines the ways in which "radical" social actors are marginalized through normative research tropes and the terrorization of critical scholarship.

Framing Female Genital Cutting: African Women's Immigration, Social Networking and the Production of Knowledge
Coza Ann Presley, Georgia State University

This paper discusses scholars' contribution to social change about Female Genital Cutting (FGC), through examining its coverage in the curriculum, its place in public discourse and the emergence of FGC as a factor in immigration politics. With increased access to global media and social networking, information on FGC has become readily available via blogs and videos. This study examines how FGC is portrayed on the Internet and how social networking produces agency for FGC activists. Finally, the paper discusses how immigration lawyers use information on FGC as they pursue changes in immigration practices for African women.

396. Cohabitation as an Alternative to Marriage
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Savannah 2

PARTICIPANTS:
Cohabitation as an Alternative to Marriage
Ciara Anna Bush, University at Albany

Marriage is an important cultural marker in our society. It is used to judge how committed a couple is to a relationship. Furthermore, it is linked to inter-couple relationship satisfaction. But, marriage is a troubled institution, rife with patriarchal and structural inequities. Cohabitation has arisen as an alternative form of coupling, but has yet to be adopted widely by heterosexual couples in the U.S. as a permanent alternative to marriage, as it has in some other countries. By looking at foreign and domestic examples this paper will present an analysis based on the research literature on how cohabitation can be a lot like marriage, yet has the potential to be truly alternative.

All The Gays are White and All the Racists are Straight: The Intersections of White Privilege and Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Queer Identities
Megan Rolfe, State University of New York, Albany

Critical whiteness studies has argued that 'white' is a socio-political identity and advanced the notion of 'white privilege'; or a hard earned white advantage, given the structure of the U.S. racial hierarchy. While such scholarship has been substantial, it has also been almost universally heteronormative, as scholars have mainly explored white privilege through in-depth interviews with white heterosexuals. White privilege, however, may play out in spaces where heterosexuals are not present. This literature review applies an intersectional lens to study a privileged position (whiteness), within a marginalized group (LGBTQ people), to illuminate how the 'masters tools' cannot be subverted through identity politics.

Gladys Bentley and A'Lelia Walker: Queering Black Women's History
Shantala Latrice Thompson, State University of New York, Albany

This presentation will center on the lives of Gladys Bentley, a blues singer during the Harlem Renaissance and A'Lelia Walker, the daughter of Madame CJ Walker and patroness of the Harlem Renaissance. Bentley was known for "flaunting" her lesbianism and transgendered appearance, while Walker hosted queer theme parties. This project will creatively interweave archival evidence - from the lives of both women and spoken word poetry/fiction to bring visibility to Black women's queerness and gender performance. This project comes out of a larger legacy to dismantle the "masters tools" and rewrite fixed notions of Black women's sexuality and queer history.

Bodies of Flesh, Bodies of Knowledge: Representations of Female Genital Cutting and Female Genital Cosmetic Surgery
Maureen Whitcomb, State University of New York, Albany

Many U.S. academic and popular feminist representations of FGC depict it as a barbaric and tortuous act that is strictly practiced in "underdeveloped" or "primitive" societies. What is often not taken into consideration, however, is the practice of female genital cosmetic surgery (FGCS) which occurs in the U.S. and other "developed" countries. I will address the ways that both practices derive from heteronormative ideals based on genital appearance and marriageability, mainstream and heterosexual pornography, and heterosexual male pleasure. I will then explore how the inability to recognize these similarities prevents effective cross-cultural dialogue and a deeper understanding of cultural practices.

398. Illuminating Addiction and Recovery through Feminism(S)
9:25 to 10:40 am • Level 2: Valdosta
This roundtable investigates the complex ways in which feminist theory and practice have intersected with the use and abuse of mind-altering substances by women. Because access to alcohol, cigarettes and drugs has frequently been deemed a masculine prerogative in American society, the use and even abuse of these substances by women has often been regarded as a feminist act. At the same time, research on and treatment for women with drug and alcohol problems has been informed by feminist analysis, while some treatment modalities such as Twelve Step programs have been critiqued as anti-feminist.

PARTICIPANTS:
Using Film to Flex an Accessible Feminist Voice
Janet L. Fitch, New Moon Productions

Transformations occur as mainstream audiences unconsciously become conscious of hegemonic and feminist principles. In the past decade, combining highly organized community engagement campaigns with documentary film became an industry norm, opening the floodgates to the public sphere to embed issues of gender, race and class that invite compelling, solution seeking dialog on seemingly intractable issues. When presented with authentic information, diverse audiences quickly become proficient at recognizing divisive political rhetoric and appreciative of the contributions of under reported groups. Feminist women entering media professions and advancing to decision-making roles, will shift status quo reporting on women and other marginalized groups.

Feminist Media Action and the Reframing of Violence Against Women
Carolyn M Byerly, Howard University

Acquaintance rape. Domestic violence. Marital rape. Child sexual assault. Sexual harassment. Feminists introduced these terms in the 1970s to name the everyday abuses women experience. Gaining wider circulation for this new language helped feminists pass laws, press for prosecution of offenders, and heal themselves from the abused they had suffered. I come to my subject both as a grassroots feminist activist and a scholar. My presentation will track the shift in public discourse on violence against women through a study of how newspaper coverage of sex crimes gradually adopted feminist language to identify men's sexual abuse and battering of women.

400. Red Light, Green Light: Family Values, Family Pride
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 2 - AV

Red Light, Green Light: Family Values, Family Pride is a documentary video based in interdisciplinary feminist life-history research with a racial-ethnically diverse group of over 100 lesbian mothers. The stories of these families living in a broad range of U.S. states demonstrate significant differences in local/state laws, and illuminate how profoundly family/marriage law and policy regulate access to the full range of citizenship rights in the U.S. We explore marriage, reproduction, adoption/ Foster care, religion, healthcare, race, and immigration policies. The film was made by an inter racial lesbian couple with children—one an interdisciplinary feminist scholar, the other an independent filmmaker.

PARTICIPANTS:
Rape Crisis and Sexual Assault Services of Augusta and Georgia Network to End Sexual Assault (GNESA) : Helping Sexual Violence Survivors Through a Feminist Framework
Rachael Foss, Augusta State University

There are many victims of sexual violence who never seek help for their abuse. Through a radical feminist framework, this paper will explore and analyze the ways non-profit organizations, Rape Crisis and Sexual Assault Services of Augusta and Georgia Network to End Sexual Assault (GNESA), address and help survivors of sexual violence speak out and heal. My paper will also offer suggestions to these organizations in order to better help and empower survivors by updating their services in light of newer radical feminist research.

Breaking Barriers in the U.S. Navy: Tackling Issues of Gender Inequality
Susan McKew, Augusta State University

The recent decision by the Department of Defense to allow women to serve aboard submarines illustrates how patriarchal barriers can be dismantled. While some concessions have been made since I served in the U.S. Navy (1975-1989) regarding gender inequality, I will explore how and why liberal feminist theory, particularly Cynthia Fuchs Epstein’s theory in Deceptive Distinctions (1988), is still relevant to analysis of the U.S. military today.

Compulsory Heterosexuality in Mad Men
Lindsay Rogilio, Augusta State University

The television series Mad Men epitomizes sexism from business relations to personal relationships, and thus emphasizes the male-oriented power structure organizing and defining these relationships. Set in the 1960s, ad-agency Sterling Cooper is home to the kingpins of advertising and the women who are their secretaries; notably, it is also a contested heterosexual space. This paper will examine the notion of compulsory heterosexuality in Mad Men that seemingly regulates the power structure, organizing and defining the roles of heterosexual, gay, and lesbian men and women in personal and business relationships—namely the relationships between Don, Betty, Peggy, Pete and Sal.

Who Really Gave Birth to Venus?: A Feminist Endeavor to Question the Role of Advertising on My Sense of Self
Melinda McKew, Augusta State University
Although feminist scholarship has exposed how advertisements commodify female bodies, such scholarship has been unable to empower me to challenge objectification. How can I resist the media's monolithic encapsulations of my body? This project presents my feminist-inspired challenge to Botticelli's painting, The Birth of Venus. Inspired by the Guerrilla Girls' and Adbusters' cultural critiques and resistance tactics, I will employ radical and Marxist feminist frames to create a painting that uses the masters' tools (i.e., advertising) to dismantle and deconstruct the masters' house—paternal and capitalist constructions of the female body as a creative expression of feminist resistance.

PARTICIPANTS:
Evangelizing orgasm: On the Capitalistic, Social, and Political Implications of Women's Sex Toy Usage in the U.S.
Beanne Fahs, Arizona State University
This paper explores women's qualitative accounts of using sex toys either during masturbation or during partnered sex. Drawing upon previous research that examined the literal versus symbolic implications of sex toys during lesbian sex, I examine the capitalistic implications of equating sexual liberation with (phallic) toys, the problematic aspects of sex positive feminism advocating sex toy usage to "discover" orgasm, the anti-vagina discourse of sex toy return policies, the heterosexist (and subversive?) implications of women interacting with "dismembered" phallicus, and the misogynistic implications of distancing women from touching their bodies.

From 'First Ever Masturbate-athon!' to 'Second Annual Sex-Positive Fair': Deploying and Disarming Queer Feminism
Jeanne Ladlow, Eastern Illinois University
In Spring, 2009, students from my campus' pride and feminist organizations hosted a Masturbate-athon and Sex Positive Fair to raise money for a local Planned Parenthood. This paper explores the queer feminist politics behind the students' efforts, chronicles the success of their fundraising event, and analyzes the public backlash—some of it feminist—that led the students to change their event dramatically in subsequent years.

Home is Where...Well, Where is it?: Investigating Intersections Between Femme Gender and Sexuality
Elizabeth Ann Suellenentrop, George Washington University
There has not been a sufficiently critical exploration of the notion of femme. In my creative writing I explore the connections between gender identities and queer culture and attempt to contribute to an understanding of femme. I explore the ironic lived experience of femme gender within queer communities; namely, the tendency of femme to become fixed within and trapped by heteronormative conceptualizations of sex and gender. I thus conclude that femme, as with many identifications, is an ambivalent category that simultaneously transcends and reifies mainstream understandings of sex and gender.

“Queering Feminist Activism: The Intersection of Feminist Identification and Sexual Orientation Across Generations”
Samantha Anne Montgomery, University of Michigan
This paper explores the intersection of feminist identity and sexual orientation across several generations of women in relation to their levels of political engagement. Specifically, data from a sample of older working women and a sample of female undergraduates will be analyzed in terms of their levels of participation in women's rights activism, as well as lesbian and gay rights activism. Moreover, comparisons between heterosexual women and sexual minority women will reveal the importance of sexual orientation to political participation. Overall, resistance to heteronormativity appears to be a key factor for feminist and queer activism, across generation and sexual orientation.

PARTICIPANTS:
Homonormals, Homonationals & Healthy Children: Prop 8 and the 'Importance of Being Ordinary'
Judy Rohrer, University of Connecticut
If Obama's victory is touted as the climax of civil rights for Black Americans, the simultaneous passage of California's Proposition 8 has been framed as an enormous unexpected set back for lesbian and gay civil rights. I move away from a rights framework toward an analysis that places gay marriage in a broader context of government regulation of kinship through specifically targeted tactics aimed at particular populations. My contention is that analyzing homonormativity and homonationals as expressed through Prop 8 helps deepen our understanding of the complex machinations of governmentality and biopower in the production of proper (gay) citizens.

Intimacies and Racializations of Healthy Children in U.S. Biosecurity Narratives
Mel Chen, University of California Berkeley
This paper explores the management of proper and improper (or queer) intimacies in relation to a fantastic U.S. idealized family deemed worthy of protection and generational continuance. Such scenes occur in increasingly biosecuritized notions of family that are subject to transnational biological panics. The focal point of "endangered" families is often a white, male child whose developmental (and anti-disability) narrative foreshadows a future generation. I discuss the 2007 "Chinese Lead Toy Scare" in terms of which preferred and dispreferred children are understood to engage in differently valued kinds of intimacies; these polarities even further constrain a heteronormative understanding of kinship.

Choosing Crip in a Culture of Life: Or, How to Think Disability in Time
Alison Kafer, Southernwestern University
What might it mean to choose disability against the backdrop of health and life? Is selecting for disability—whether by refusing to terminate a pregnancy or by using reproductive technologies to achieve a desired trait—necessarily unhealthy? Are such choices transgressive responses to ableism, essentialist reifications of the body, or both? In this essay, I explore the possibility of choosing disability in a context in which disabled bodies are marked as "out of time," as futures to be avoided.
What's a Feminist to Do? How New Anti-abortion Strategies and Technologies Reconfigure Debates over Sex, Race and Abortion

Sujatha Jesudason, Generations Ahead

One of the more incendiary tactics by anti-choice advocates is legislation to ban abortion for sex and race. Conflating charges of sex selection with claims of "race-selective abortions" and black genocide, they introduced legislation to "protect" Asian and African American women while undermining abortion. Yet, selective abortion and technologies that allow for trait selection are challenging feminists to develop more nuanced positions on reproductive freedom least we abandon our commitments to race, disability and gender justice. What positions might we take? What are the politics "discouraging" sex selective practices and pivoting to "healthy parenting" while protecting women's reproductive freedom?

404. Gender and the Science of Difference: Cultural Politics of Contemporary Science and Medicine
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 2: Augusta

How does contemporary science contribute to our understanding about what it means to be women or men? What are the social implications of scientific claims about differences between 'male' and 'female' brains, hormones, and genes? How does culture influence scientific and medical research and its findings about human sexuality, especially so-called normal and deviant desires and behaviors? This roundtable discussion explores these questions by examining cases within contemporary science that simultaneously shape and are shaped by gender ideals and images.

10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 10

The assault on Black women is invisible to the critical consciousness of both the Civil Rights and the Women's movements. Why must we say Trust Black Women? Why are there continuous assaults on Black women's human rights? This workshop will discuss recent and original opinion research and the lack of trust from Black men and our allies in the fight over abortion rights and for Reproductive Justice showing how theory influences activist practice.

10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 13

PARTICIPANTS:

Third Pregnancy: Women, Aging and Identity in American Culture
Roberta Maiherofer, University of Graz

Drawing on Ursula LeGuin's and Germaine Greer's formulations of menopause as 'the third pregnancy' and 'the change,' this presentation explores the necessity for women in their middle years to 'change'—to define themselves in their own terms—in order to accomplish successful, meaningful aging. This construction of individual identity occurs in the face of societal pressure to conform to the stereotypical roles accompanying the status of old woman. Questioning the value of chronological age as a basis for identity, this presenter argues, makes possible self-definition not based on a gender-or-age-defined position and gives women authority to shape their own identities.

Hormone Nostalgia: Menopause Discourse Since 2002
Margaret Morganroth Gullette, Brandeis University

This presentation examines cultural narratives of menopause following the shocking mid-study closure of the WHI's double-blind investigation of hormone treatment in 2002 and asks: has the master narrative of menopause (as hormone-driven disease marking the onset of sexual and physical old age) changed? Bringing together data on post-2002 hormone use—including trends and advice in media treatments of 'symptoms,' medical practice in relation to 'menopausal' women, and the continuing influence of the pharmaceutical industry over doctors—she concludes that, despite some positive developments, the main outcome has been the construction of "hormone nostalgia," through which tired past paradigms live on.
The Fertile Crone: Emerging Narratives of Post-Menopausal Birth
Elizabeth Gregory, University of Houston
As increasing numbers of post-menopausal women give birth via egg donation or become mothers via adoption, our narratives of fertility, motherhood and age are shifting. This presentation analyzes narratives of older motherhood in the press, in current academic discourse about fertility technology, and in first-person reports from post-menopausal mothers in order to question what is lost and gained in altering the traditional life sequence. She also explores what difference age makes in mothering and with what effects for children, what is at stake for the polity, and to what extent late fertility is a feminist advance and/or a patriarchal incursion.

409. Is Law Redeemable? Thinking Through the Consequences of the Legal Regulation of Sexuality
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 2

PARTICIPANTS:
Disability, Sexuality, and the Law
Kristina Gupta, Emory University
This paper uses a 2008 court decision in which sex was declared a "major life activity" to examine the relationship between law and sexual rights for people with disabilities. On the one hand, this decision offered symbolic support for a notion of sexual rights. However, the decision reaffirmed the connection between disability and sexual dysfunction (the defendant lost her interest in sex as a result of cancer) and contributed to the marginalization of people with disabilities who are not interested in sex. This paper concludes that any use of the law will have contradictory effects.

Feminism and the Representation of Sexually Dangerous Persons
Cyd Cipolla, Emory University
In the 1990s a series of highly publicized sexual crimes against children initiated the creation of new sexual predator legislation; including an unprecedented form of civil commitment in which certain highly dangerous sex offenders are institutionalized after the completion of their criminal sentences. Since then, critics of these laws argue that they are designed to prevent the most uncommon form of sexual violence - that perpetrated by strangers. This paper demonstrates how this focus on "sexually dangerous persons" works at odds with both feminist interpretations of sexual violence as systemic and cultural phenomenon and queer theories of sexual identity.

Free Speech, Strip Clubs, and Feminist Strategy
Nikki Karalekas, Emory University
In Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000) the Supreme Court argued that stripping is only partially protected as free speech and therefore can be regulated. This paper critically examines feminist reactions to Erie that call for expanding strippers' free speech protections. While expanding legal protections offered to sex workers is feminist, this particular strategy limits the scope of protection and recognition by representing striping as an expression of true sexuality rather than work. Such strategy fails to understand the economics and relational aspects of stripping and contributes to the impasse between agency and victimization that characterizes feminist debates about sex work.

10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 3

PARTICIPANTS:
Reinterpreting Tradition: Staging the Sri Lankan Civil Conflict Through Hindu Narratives
Ahalya Satkunaratnam, Northeastern Illinois University
This paper examines the ways in which female Bharata Natyam dance choreographers reinterpreted familiar narratives in Hindu tradition to address the civil war in Sri Lanka. Using feminist dance ethnography as a method of analysis, I closely read choreographies and performances to illuminate the subverted meanings about the civil war between the separatist army, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, and the Government of Sri Lanka. These re-interpreted narratives counter dominant and patriarchal narratives of nationalism and militarization in the country.

Women and the Bible: Imagining Oneself as Another
Susannah Laramere Kidd, Emory University
This paper describes how women imaginatively enter narratives that they read in the Bible. It draws on a larger ethnography on Protestant women's Bible studies and religious reading groups. Whether they were taking on the viewpoint of the Israelites, Moses, Yahweh, the disciples or Jesus, the women imaginatively try on ways of being in relationship with God and with each other. This paper uses feminist theories of narrative identity to ask how feminists should evaluate these imaginative practices and the influence of the Biblical narratives in these women's lives.

Dancing Autobiography: Movement Narratives of Feminist Subjectivities
Alison Bory, Davidson College
Traditional autobiographical narratives have celebrated a masculinist approach to defining subjectivity, reveling in assertions of individualism and accomplishment, while feminist scholars have offered women's life writings as implicit contestations of those narratives. Employing this feminist lens on close readings of two dance works, Urban Bush Women's Self-Portrait (1997) and Meredith Monk's Education of a Girlchild (1972), I examine how contemporary choreographers re-imagine the myth of individual selfhood offered in the autobiographical project. In both their narratives and choreographic processes, I suggest, these performance pieces offer strategies for navigating complex articulations of identity that insist on an understanding of selfhood as always simultaneously collective, culturally-constructed and in process.

411. Beyond the Global/Local Divide: Transnational and Rural Queer Intimacies, Discourses and Movements
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 4

Homonational Subjection: Localizing Transnational Intimacies
Melissa Autumn White, Syracuse University
This paper explores experiences of homonational subjection through a focus on how transnational queer intimacies become localized against a backdrop of a deepening global apartheid system. Drawing on transcripts produced in interviews with transnational LGBTQ migrants and sponsors who have secured common residency rights in Canada through same-sex family class... immigration applications, this paper argues that the uneven recognition of queer intimacies across nationalized boundaries produces the very possibility of homonational identifications. Ultimately, the paper is interested in the affective, embodied lives of transnational systems of governance, and considers 'the intimate' and 'the global' as intertwined and indeed co-constitutinal.

Muslim (queer) Women, Human Rights Strategies, and LGBTQ Organizing in the Arab World: Considering a Local Archive in a Global Movement
Ayisha Ashley Al-Sayyad, Emory University
Despite transnational protectionist and Western nationalist deployments of Arab and Muslim sexualities as simultaneously perverse and repressed, two organizations in Lebanon founded on non-normative sexualities persist. While Helen runs a visible community center in Beirut, Meem limits membership to women through an underground network of support. This project moves towards mapping a genealogy of the traffic between local grass-roots organizations in Lebanon and transnational LGBTQ rights discourses through analyzing the divergent strategies deployed by Helen and Meem. The paper considers: How are transnational conceptions of Arab and Muslim sexualities complicated by the discourses and strategies employed by queer women in Beirut?

Localizing the Global, Ruralizing the Queer: Theorizing and Materializing Queer Women in the Rural Midwest
Carly Ann Thomsen, University of California, Santa Barbara
Just as relationships between the west and non-west hinge upon colonial relations and power dynamics, relationships between the urban and rural are also defined by differential access to power and resources. Drawing from scholarship on global queer sexualities and interviews with queer women in the rural Midwest, this paper examines the ways in which transnational LGBTQ rights-gaining strategies, which prioritize visibility and depend upon identity politics, collide with experiences and discourses of queer women in the rural Midwest, critiquing ubiquitous calls for queer visibility, challenging western and urban-based queer rights discourses, and re-thinking local/global and rural/urban binaries in the process.

412. The College Hook Up Culture: Risks, Reasons, and Realities
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia S - AV
Spitting Game: The College Hook Up Culture is an important film that challenges the status quo by providing students & educators with up to date information on the risks, reasons, and realities within the college hook up culture. Comprehensive and critical ‘insider’ information from current college students and notable experts in the field is punctuated by thought provoking statistics. The diverse student-driven narrative is engaging, highly educational, and leads viewers on a virtual tour of topics that include alcohol abuse, drugs, hooking up, peer pressure, STD's, unplanned pregnancy, sexual assault, and consent.

Mobilizing Shame and Commodifying Redemption: Images of Children and Narratives of Feminist Intervention
Juliana Marie Kubala, Georgia State University
Images of youth and children from the "global south" - the starving third-world child, the mutilated African girl, the terrorist Muslim youth, the promiscuous (Latina) teenager mother, the Thai victim of sexual trafficking - become commodified in feminist discourse through mobilizing apparenty contradictory scenarios of affective investment. These stories veer back and forth between crisis and rescue narratives, sometimes within the very same image. These images also leak into the discourse surrounding youth within the U.S. to maintain racist and xenophobic narratives of victimization: the aptly titled "Superpredator Meets Teenage Mom" (Hendrixson, 2002) demonstrates how images of transnational youth become saturated with danger through a whole host of associations, such as violent or reproductive takeover, which would deprive 'our' future generations of their rightful entitlements.

Commodity Redemption: A Public Ritual of Propitiation of Fetal Spirits in Thailand
Megan Sinnott, Georgia State University
The metaphorical crisis evoked in the concept of wandering child/baby/fetal spirits (common in Thailand) has been incorporated into propitiation rites and practices, and most recently, in a new form of public ritual of commodity redemption. This paper is based on anthropological research conducted in Thailand in 2009, 2010 and 2011 on the subject of spirit and ghost beliefs in Thailand with particular focus on child/baby/fetal spirits. The public ceremony held at Wat Khae in Suphanburi Province in October of 2009 and 2010 to make merit for aborted fetuses and child spirits was an innovative religious ceremony that accessed and interpreted widespread beliefs and practices relating to the propitiation of the spirits of babies and children. The ritual fuses current "crisis discourses" of abortions associated with a purported irresponsible citizenry and the moral turpitude of the Thai state in crisis. This paper, by using a feminist and queer theory framework centered on the work of Lauren Berlant and Lee Edelman, explores how understandings of childhood, parenthood, womanhood and citizenry are framed and contested through these innovative, if problematic, public rituals held at Wat Khae.

Farm-Fresh Milk and Blue Cupcakes: Ethnographic Research on Children's Food, Parenting, and Value in the United States
Jennifer Patico, Georgia State University
For more than a decade, observers of U.S. society have noted the "time bind" (Hochschild 1997) faced by double-earner families, wherein both mothers and fathers balance ever-lengthening professional work days with the labor of housekeeping and child-raising. Meanwhile, popular exposés of the industrial food complex, food safety scares, and increasing alarm about childhood obesity all point to the fact that food - seemingly the most basic of a family's needs - is in fact a charged field for both public and household scrutiny. This paper grapples with the question of how food provisioning reflects parents' ideas about the personal and physical qualities they should create in their children (longevity, beauty, individual capacities of taste).
Dissident Youth: New Left Activism among Atlanta's High School Students in the Long Sixties
Andrew Reisinger, Georgia State University

As civil rights, anti-war, feminist, lesbian/gay, and student countercultural activism proliferated in the late 1960s and 1970s, adults in positions of power (as parents, school administrators, and/or politicians) became increasingly alarmed as participation in these social movements began to draw on an ever-younger, and supposedly more impressionable, population, namely high school students. In this paper, I explore the ways in which Atlanta's underground newspaper, The Great Speckled Bird, contributed to and journalistically reported on the alleged 'crisis' of youth, particularly in terms of the threat to gender and sexual norms, in an effort to ascertain the extent to which the newspaper framed the youth as active protagonists struggling to create a more just world rather than as naive youth seduced by a wayward and dangerous popular culture.

414. “One of These Things is not like the Other”: Engaging Identities and Bodies in the Classroom
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 1: Georgia 7

Our roundtable focuses on approaches to navigating identities in the classroom, and the possibilities and conflicts that arise. These spaces, where feminist knowledge is shared, debated and produced, are key to contesting everyday practices of domination not left at the classroom's door. An emphasis is given to embodiment's significance in exchanges between instructors and students, particularly when course topics, such as disability or transgen-derism, are most readily mapped onto instructor's bodies. Presenters teach across fields including public health, sociology and women's studies, and draw upon teaching experience and feminist scholarship by Audre Lorde, Paula Moya and others.

Tricky Business: Feminist Implications for Tackling the Demand Side of Sex Work
Ummini Khan, Carleton University

Feminists have revealed how the criminalization and pathologization of sex work has overly and unfairly focused on the female seller, while ignoring the male buyer. However, recently there has been an increased attention paid to sex trade clients by police and the law. This paper will analyze extra-legal strategies that address clients and purport to deter them by using shaming tactics, educational workshops and consciousness raising techniques. While some feminists applaud this focus on clients, from an intersectional critical race-feminist-queer approach, I argue that these social control strategies produce and naturalize gender and sexual norms while perpetuating racial hierarchies.

Look at the Baaaaaaaaaybeeeeeeceee: an Autoethnographic Exploration of Ultrasound Discourses
Cheryl Anne DeFlavis, University of South Florida

During my pregnancy, I discovered three inter-related themes in the discourses that surrounded my ultrasound images: the fetus pictured in my ultrasound images was considered to be a tiny human being, the images made my pregnancy real and public, and the ultrasound procedure gave my partner and I an opportunity to bond with the baby. In this paper, after briefly recounting the history of the ultrasound machine, I investigate these themes and explore their implications for feminist theories of the body within the context of cyborgs, posthumanism, and simulacrum.

Queer Disability Blogs: Subject (Re)Formalting in the Twenty-First Century
Zoe DuPree Fine, University of South Florida

Through content analysis this presentation explores how blogging gives individuals with marked bodies, namely those who have disabilities and who identify as queer, opportunities to navigate and redefine their identities in virtual reality. With scholarship on the technologized body including Foucault's biopolitics, Hixon's informationalizing and reforming bodies and subjectivities, and Balsamo's virtual reality technologies' engagement with socially and culturally marked bodies, I analyze how blogging uniquely enhances the ways that individuals who have disabilities and who identify as queer find their voices, self-reflect, describe their experiences being Doubly Othered, and inform the public. Technology therefore continues to create endless sites of transformative possibilities.

Working It Out: The Rhetoric of Wii Fit
Mary Catherine Whitlock, University of South Florida

This presentation explores the specific story told by Wii Fit as one of avid normalization and personal responsibility that reflects larger societal norms. While the theme of normalization is not new to female bodies, I argue that Wii Fit extends its panoptic gaze by concentrating on all bodies. Focusing on themes of surveillance, I will investigate how the videogame Wii Fit employs techniques to demand unnecessary and even harmful normalization of the body. My investigation of the story that Wii Fit tells about bodies translates as being representative of larger narratives about bodies, health, responsibility and obesity.

417. Bridges and Boundaries: Attempts at Transnational Organizing outside Academia
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 2: Macon
Roundtable panelists will share their experiences working in North/South collaborations with men and women from Germany, Syria and Sudan to develop transnational feminist awareness and build coalitions. Panelists detail efforts at non-hierarchical organizing with colleagues both inside and outside academia, detailing methods that make use of classroom discussions, online learning platforms and a two-week-long summer school in Berlin with over 40 participants. Presenters will focus on the highlights and stumbling blocks that such collaborations engender, including the negotiation of ties to nation, race, class, sexuality, gender and religion that presented themselves in expected and unexpected ways throughout the project’s journey.

If “No Means Yes” and “Yes Means Anal”, What Does Anal Mean?: Problematic Feminist Responses to Yale’s Call to Sexual Violence
Lena Judith Drake, Arizona State University
Yale’s situation of late 2010—wherein reprehensible chanting of “no means yes, yes means anal” and other sexually violent phrases were broadcast by a fraternity—deserves and received a wide range of feminist comment. This paper presents a case study by which to deconstruct how particular feminist “deployments” of responses to societal violence, especially the discussion of “anal” as degrading, may actually reinforce a hegemonic view of sexuality, and may be harmful to those already marginalized sexualities. The specific contexts of Yale, rape acceptance, and anti-violence responses as inclusive or exclusive are evaluated, and expanded upon.

Ignorance, Willful Ignorance and the Persistent Problem of Campus Peer Sexual Violence
Nancy Chi Cantalupo, Georgetown University
This presentation draws on comprehensive research conducted by the presenter on the law related to campus peer sexual violence, including Title IX and the Clery Act, to suggest ways in which we can change the current law so as to end this persistent problem. An attorney, women’s studies and law professor, and former Women’s Center director, she argues that infusing the feminist insights regarding sexual violence developed by women’s studies, women’s centers, and victims’ advocacy offices into the law will transform school responses to peer sexual violence and make those responses vastly more effective in preventing the violence.

Re-imagining Campus Sexual Assault Policy: An Exploration of Organizational Knowledge and Response
Shireen Sarah Ghorbani, University of Utah
This paper claims that campus sexual assault policy does little to address pervasive issues surrounding campus sexual assault. An analysis of federal policy on campus sexual assault exposes the ways in which certain kinds of responses about specific issues are privileged, such as concerns about campus security, while other dimensions of this organizational crisis and reality are ignored. This essay presents a plan for a deeper investigation of sites of organizational knowledge that could reframe the discussion and re-imagine potential responses to campus sexual violence in ways that meaningfully address rape culture and perpetrator behavior.

419. The “Identity” of Feminism in a Neo-Liberal Era: A Dialogue on Individualism, Subjection, and Politics
10:50 to 12:05 pm • Level 2: Savannah 2
This workshop provides a forum for critique and discussion of the various complex forms of depolitization of feminism as a movement in the US. We start from the premise that the global systematic sexual exploitation of women is on the rise while simultaneously feminism (in the west) as a grass roots political movement is in various stages of cooptation and devolution. Our focus is on an examination of how forces of cooptation, particularly (neo)liberal individualism, have worked to “reshape” feminism as politics into “feminism as personal identity” and diminished its still radical potential for challenging women’s subordination.

Affective Histories: Literature as Counter-Discourse
Heather Rehillan, Anne Arundel Community College

Building on the work of Marlene Nourbese Philip, Barbara Christian, Barbara Omolade and others, I use literature to complement and challenge traditional histories. Using Sara Ahmed's concept of affective economies, I construct "affective histories" of colonial schooling in the Anglophone Caribbean. I suggest that Caribbean novels like Merle Hodge's Crick Crack, Monkey (Trinidad), Merle Collins's Angel (Grenada), and Jamaica Kincaid's Annie John and Lucy (Antigua) supplement traditional histories of colonial schooling which rely on missionary and colonial reports, by focusing on emotional interaction in ways that expose the hidden curriculum of colonial schooling, and in particular its effect on girls.

Performing in Blue-Face: Colonial Fantasies and Postmodern Identity in Avatar
Juan R. Portillo, University of Texas at Austin

In this paper, I intend to deconstruct the normalizing discourses that make the film Avatar a vehicle through which the white fantasy of "benevolent conqueror" is normalized and fulfilled. I propose that discourses of colonialism in the film arise due to an identity crisis in white males living in a postmodern world. I also suggest how women of color have the capital to challenge a mainstream media that suggests that we live in a post-feminist, post-racial era.

The Feminization of American Slavery
Jennie Lightweis-Coff, Tulane University

Scholarship on American slavery has regarded cities as exceptional, despite the fact that urban slavery was a form of domestic and intimate violence against women, who constituted the majority of people enslaved within the metropole. In order to approach American slavery, one must do so "without walk," because the archive of the practice is revealed outside of the space of the academy. To complicate the boundaries of the archive, I begin with a travelogue that indexes the spatial dimensions of enslavement in the historic homes of Savannah (Georgia), and conclude by critiquing the ways that traditional historiographies have ignored the city.

Survival and Work: How Women Live With HIV/AIDS
Donna Abrams, Georgia Gwinnett College

AIDS research has sought to focus heavily on gender relations as they shape and constrain women's ability to protect themselves from the virus. A positive network of support allows women with HIV/AIDS to have the physical and emotional support needed while giving women a sense of trust and security. In addition, these networks help women to continue to lead functional lives, therefore helping them to better cope with HIV/AIDS. Through narratives and interviews, this study examines how working women function daily with HIV/AIDS and also discloses how work continues to impact their lives and can impact their abilities to survive.

Contemporary Treatment of African American Women by OB/GYN Medical Professionals
Monica Brown, Walden University

This paper will explore the growing research that supports the argument that there are inequalities that exist when receiving healthcare in the United States. These inequalities tend to be based on race, class and gender and research shows that those factors play a pivotal role in how patients are treated. More specifically, I will examine how OB/GYN practitioners respond to African-American women - what types of questions are asked, the assumptions and stereotypes made, the level of treatment a patient receives, and the level of attentiveness and sensitivity healthcare providers offer based on that patient's race, class and sexual orientation.

"Our Survival Takes Precedence Over Our Rights:" Learning from Factory Women in Sao Paulo, Brazil

Beth Higgs, Georgia Gwinnett College

After conducting ethnographic research among women in pharmaceutical factories in Sao Paulo during Brazil's "Return to Democracy" in the 1980s, the author began to question an ethnocentric gaze in some North American-based feminist research and activism. Because their daily living and working experiences differed from those of their working class male peers, these factory women organized their collective political action differently. Over resistance from male political leaders, women organized autonomous political action around family health issues. The author's experience leads her to support political autonomy as different groups of women define their own needs and political goals.

Irish Mothering, Foodways and the Great Hunger
Polly F. Radosh, State University of New York, Geneseo

This paper will explore the development of Irish foodways that were uniquely tied to patterns of mothering that evolved after the Irish potato famine of 1845-1851. Mothering patterns distinct to Irish culture will be examined as the means by which post-famine foodways were infused into Irish culture and exported out of Ireland in post-famine emigration. The importance of Irish women as the primary agents of socialization will be discussed.

Subverting the Master's Science: Feminist Philosophical Contributions to Teaching about Science

12:15 to 1:30 pm • Level 1: Atlanta 3 - AV

PARTICIPANTS:

Subverting Deeply Held Assumptions about the Structure of Science
Claudia Murphy, Minnesota State University, Moorhead

I will unpack the current dichotomous assumptions about objectivity embedded in the ordinary conceptions about science. I will show how these mistaken assumptions function to separate science as a human endeavor. I will appeal to the history of science to give us a different and alternative picture of the scientific enterprise. And finally I will explain a step by step procedure designed to convince students of science that STEM disciplines are socially and politically located in the matrices of domination and oppression.
Teaching About Science as a Feminist Tool: Challenging the Fact/Value and Reason/Emotion Dichotomies
Susan V. Castagnetto, Intercollegiate Women's Studies of the Claremont Colleges

I will discuss the use of feminist epistemological tools to teach about how science is necessarily value-laden and how that is compatible with its being a useful feminist tool (rather than grounds for dismissal). I will discuss ways to teach students to understand and think critically about what "good" science can mean from a feminist perspective—and whether and in what senses science can usefully be "political"—including theoretical readings along with real world examples of how feminist scientists incorporate their values into their work.

Fact and Value: Service Learning Can Enhance Scientific Content While Adding Social Value and Context
Kristina S. Mead, University of California, Berkeley

In contrast with previous notions that giving science a social value detracts from the scientific content of the course material, service learning components can provide students with ways to see the full scientific process in action. I will present data from a neuroscience and women's studies cross-listed course called "Sex, Gender, and the Brain". This course uses a service learning component to enhance learning outcomes of second graders, but in the process, collects data about gender and student engagement. Developing and testing hypotheses about gender and learning involves the college students in the scientific process and enhances their understanding of the concepts discussed in class.

Beyond Stigma: Life Histories as a Method in Sex Work Research
Susan Catherine Dewey, University of Wyoming

Feminist collaborative research with sex workers can be complicated because of the stigmatized and/or illegal nature of sex work itself. This paper demonstrates how a life history-based methodology provides a particularly illustrative means by which to reveal how sex workers negotiate their lives as parents, employees, and family members while working in a profession widely regarded as incompatible with motherhood and fidelity. Findings presented in this paper will demonstrate that more life history-based research on sex workers' lives will help to move feminist scholarship on this subject beyond well-established binaries of consent and coercion.

Medical Care for Sex Workers
Megan Andellox, Independent Scholar

Sex workers frequently experience social stigma and marginalization that impacts their ability to receive (and sometimes to seek out) health care. As a consequence, their health problems have the potential to remain unrecognized and undiagnosed. This paper highlights some of the key reasons for sex workers' avoidance of health professionals while simultaneously providing insight into how doctors can better provide care for this underserved population. Speaker Four will identify and discuss the health risks that accompany various forms of sex work and explore methods health care providers can employ to approach this population in a compassionate and holistic manner.

Feminism and Sex Work: The Subaltern's Speaking but Nobody's Listening
Susan Lopez, Independent Scholar

This paper highlights the struggles that sex workers, an oft-silenced and predominantly female group, have faced with particular respect to the conflation of their chosen form of work with sex trafficking. Speaker One will explore contemporary social justice movements for sex workers' rights while examining the intersections between feminist practice and perspectives on sex work. Arguing that all feminists should be able to relate to sex workers' desires to promote choice, safety, bodily autonomy and access to healthcare, this paper presents new directions for feminist engagement with social justice activism.

Our Roles and Methods: Street Sex Work and Activists
Jill McCracken, University of South Florida, St. Petersburg

As a way of centering both methodologies and marginalized populations in order to subvert and resist dominant constructions of identity, Speaker Two explores the role of ethnography and her own positionality as a researcher, activist, and educator. She places the voices of eighteen women who worked on the street exchanging sex for money, drugs, or other gain at the center of her analysis in order to show how the questions that researchers ask of and about these communities not only informs their answers, but also influences scholars' perspectives on how knowledge is created and disseminated in the field.

War on Gaza: the Hidden Crises for Women
Sherry Gorelick, Rutgers University; Penny Rosenwasser, City College of San Francisco

Israel's attack on Gaza in 2008-9 created hidden crises for women. Beyond hundreds of women killed, survivors had to comfort traumatized children, raising families in tents after the destruction of 4,100 homes, and of water systems. Two years later, with Israel prohibiting the importation of building materials, more than 1000 Palestinian families still live in temporary tents. 95% of drinking water is unclea. This paper relates the difficulties faced by Gazan women and their supporters to the literature on women and war.

"Analyzing the Strategic Use of Peacekeeping and the Politics of Protection."
Courtney E. Reynolds, University of Cincinnati

After the devastating earthquake in Haiti, human rights discourse was implemented to "save" the Haitian people, specifically the Haitian women. As gender violence acts have risen in numbers, I plan to show the framework used in the human rights discourse to intervene and advance USA foreign policy, even if the intervention violates human rights. By incorporating assessments of Geraldine Terry, Inderpal Grewal and Kelly Oliver, coalescing with the Mission des Nations Unies pour la stabilization en Haiti (MINUSTAH), I will evidence how the "politics of protection" and the "politics of crisis" have become the 21st century's method of imperialism.

This paper provides an argument for and illustration of how to pursue the direct study of lived-experiences of sexuality. It illustrates how Communicology allows for a sustained and rigorous study of the meaningfulness of sexual experience as it becomes manifest in immediate, concrete, and embodied realities. Sexuality is understood as both capable of perpetuating human isolation and degradation as much as an experience of tremendously shared human intimacy and mutual recognition. Specific issues addressed include how presuppositions regarding gender and sexuality are brought into direct studies of the lived experiences of sexuality, especially concerning the predominance of the heterosexual-homosexual binary.

Dealing Cards, Listening to Women: A Qualitative Research Technique to Elicit Embodied Experiences

Barbara Sutton, State University of New York, Albany

Based on a study on body politics in Argentina, this presentation explores the benefits, drawbacks, and potential applications of an interviewing technique that relies on cards printed with keywords related to the body. Informed by a feminist approach and a sociological interest in embodiment, this method offered a playful way to elicit serious talk about women's embodied experiences. The use of "concept cards" helped reveal words filled with political or metaphorical significance, pointing to thorny, silenced, or contested issues. Initially conceived as an icebreaker, this simple, yet effective, technique yielded rich and complex narratives about women's diverse bodily worlds.

Unearthing Birth Control Narratives in the Archive: Rewriting the History of The Pill as a Eugenics Tool

Jamie Schmidt Wagman, Saint Louis University

This paper argues that American scientists, physicians, media and population control supporters wielded the first birth control pill as a eugenics tool. I provide historical context about the treatment of the minority woman's body during the first clinical birth control trials in Puerto Rico in 1956, and build a narrative from voices in several women's history archives that critique the national narrative about birth control giving women sexual freedom and choice. This often told story about gaining opportunity in the "promised land" is a story that speaks to national conceptions of race, sexuality, and gender.

Indigenous Feminisms Coming Alive: Global Indigenous Women's Movements

PARTICIPANTS:

Elizabeth Gunn, Morgan State University

Contemporary Chicana novelist Ana Castillo builds within and beyond indigenous traditions that revere the woman-nature reductionist continuity; she simultaneously writes to subvert an imposed Eurocentric silencing of latina and indigenous woman as the other-other. I will argue that whereas lesbianism is systematically associated with surplus, Castillo employs narraative devices which question the symbolic system from and within nature. In a society which meshes gender-nature-production, lesbianism unsettles the order by revealing its charade-structure. This disruption at the textual, narrative, and theoretical levels is central to a queer narrative that swims in the porous space of hybridism, of porous borderland identities.

Independent Feminist Activism in the Amazon

Beth Williford, Manhattanville College

This paper will explore indigenous feminist organizing and activism in the Ecuadorian Amazon. In the heart of the Amazonian jungle, some indigenous women are forming their own women's organizations built on principals of empowerment and women's voice to respond to colonial influences penetrating the indigenous Ecuadorian communities. This project will demonstrate how these organizations play an important role at the grassroots, national, and international levels. The organizations simultaneously respond to community level needs by creating economic opportunities for women while also challenging globalization by raising their collective voices in international forums over effects of neo-liberal policies felt in their communities.

The Risks of Student Activism In and Out of the Classroom

12:15 to 1:30 pm • Level 1: Georgia 11

Bridging theory and practice is integral to women's and gender studies curricula; however, incorporating activist projects into our courses presents significant pedagogical, not to mention social and political, challenges. This roundtable explores the complexities of student activism in and out of the classroom. We focus specifically on several recent activist projects undertaken at our university that had profound, both positive and negative, impacts on our community. While significant attention is often given to the rewards of student activism, we ask roundtable participants to consider the serious risks of engaging students as activists, especially in climates that are unwelcoming or hostile.

Kyriarchy, Feminism and the Promise in Adolescent Girls in Postfeminist Times
Louise Marie Doire, College of Charleston
Adolescent girls' identity shifts: in group composition (Weis & Fine, 2001), development (Brunner, 1994; Parenti, 1999; Wartenberg, 1988), and articulation (Bloom, 1996) make them powerful postmodern and postfeminist examples of the promise of kyriarchy in their position as the front line of the future of feminism. Founded from the same feminist religious tradition that spawned Schussler Fiorenza and her analysis of feminism this panelist explores kyriarchy as a way of exploring how feminism is moving and evolving among adolescent girls as they gain, explore and alter forms of feminist power, thus subverting existing hierarchies of power that subjugate postfeminist girls.

Liminality, Kyriarchy and Intersectionality: If it's All Edges and Fluid Spaces Where am I?
Kerrita Kimberly Mayfield, University of Massachusetts, Amherst
Much has been made about the postfeminist moment in the postmodern era. Accompanying handwringing ponders the message, mobilization and methods of new feminist movements and how they play out on a national stage. Kyriarchy revels in the fluid evolutionary forms of feminism. However, Mohanty (2003) cautions us that when any language change occurs, users run the risk of eradicating the very boundaries that frame identity; and Luff (2009) shares the same concerns about the trend of intersectionality in the postmodern and the subsequent flattening of personal categories and descriptions. This author explores the complications and permanence of liminal and intersecting identities (postcolonial, postracial, postfeminist, etc.) and power within the promise of kyriarchy.

In this session I will share a holistic framing of the system of inequity, one that explores the continual interaction between the internal (personal) and external (interpersonal, structural) manifestations of bias. This frame exposes the importance of continual self-work of understanding and healing one's own internalized privilege/oppresion as integral to the ability of scholars and change makers to analyze and dismantle systemic inequity, and to develop a well of value-centered love to sustain an active social justice stance. I will use clips from my new documentary film about systemic inequity (debut Nov 2011) that is designed for dialogue and transformative learning.

Breaking Down Walls: Teaching for Social Transformation in a Queer, Feminist Class in a Anti-Immigrant, Anti-Queer State
Arianne Lynne Burford, Northern Arizona University
This paper emerges from my experience teaching in Women's and Gender Studies at two different universities in Arizona and the disturbing anti-immigrant racist ideologies. My project will connect what I have observed to feminist and queer theory to analyze why students' responses to the documentary Made in LA have changed so drastically, specifically in the wake of SB1070. I will propose ideas and invite dialogue about how teaching for social transformation can address these challenges. How can we break down walls to adequately address social injustice regarding the border and decentralize knowledge production and neoliberal politics?

Against Enlightened Sexism: Teaching Feminism in Non-WS Classrooms
Laura K. Gronewold, University of Arizona, Tucson
Current college students have come of age in an era where Susan J. Douglas calls enlightened sexism, a prevalent philosophy adopted by the likes of Palin that argues that the advances of feminism have resulted in complete equality for women. This paper proposes strategies for bringing feminism into non-Women's Studies classrooms to integrate unconventional methods into English classes. Feminist knowledge formation must stretch beyond the walls of Women's Studies and/or Gender Studies departments. For those who teach outside of WS classrooms, it is crucial to teach a social justice approach to knowledge production.

Can I Really Call Myself a Feminist and Defend Nicki Minaj
Chamara Jewel Kwaywe, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
This paper examines my experiences teaching a course dedicated to Black Women in the diaspora at a Mid-Western University and students reading of Pop-Artist Nicki Minaj's popularity and sexuality as an inherent problem to the crisis of Black Women in the Diaspora. Using Womanism and Hip-Hop Feminism as guiding theories, this paper discusses some of the main themes used in the class to discuss Black Women in the Diaspora and throughout the semester Pop-Artist Nicki Minaj subsequently became a way for me to push students to think about queerness: in particular homophobia in the Black community; black women's sexuality: in particular the deviant black female body; and the differences between Womanism, Caribbean Feminism, Africana Feminism and Hip Hop Feminism: in particular how theory is applicable to their/our everyday experiences of what it means to be a Black woman. Written as both a polemic and an ethnography, the paper pushes the author (and others) to examine her own (their own) teaching.

"I am a Woman, I am Egyptian, I am the Revolution."
Sophia Azeb, State University of New York, Buffalo
On January 25th, 2011, Egyptian citizens flooded the streets in order to tear down Hosni Mubarak's thirty-year long dictatorship and regime. Despite incredible poverty, police brutality, manufactured religious and racial strife and the normalized sexual harassment and abuse of women, millions of people lent their energy and voices to the revolt. During this time, Western media either celebrated the "unusual" participation and leadership of Egyptian women in the revolution or utilized anti-terrorist fear-mongering rhetoric (inherently racist and Islamophobic) of an "Islamist" takeover that would extend the subjugation and abuse of women in "the Muslim world". Both of these Orientalist narratives deny the long history of Arab and Muslim feminism as well as the agency of Egyptian women.

"Bearing Gifts?: Theoretical and Organizational Tensions Between Anarchist and Feminist Responses to the 2010 Greek Economic Crisis."
Theresa Anne Warburton, State University of New York, Buffalo
During the 2010 Greek economic crisis, scattered and decontextualized images of anarchists appeared in mainstream Western media more often than anytime since the 1999 Battle in Seattle. These representations of anarchism served to both obscure the human costs of austerity and delegitimize the anarchist critique of state power. At the same time, reports of sexual harassment during anarchist actions in Greece and the failure of contemporary anarchist theories to take feminist thought seriously raise significant questions about how many anarchists reproduce gender-based power inequalities while mounting a critique of state power. How can feminist thinkers at once learn from anarchist organizing during crises of the state without abandoning a focus on misogyny and gender essentialism in anarchism?

"Are the Chilean Miners the Big Brothers of Neoliberal Exploitation?"
Maria Fernanda Claser Danton, State University of New York, Buffalo
The big international media carnival that originated after the catastrophic accident that buried 33 Chilean miners has shown how extreme exploitation of labor can be easily transmitted and perceived as theatricality, a sort of reality TV show that portrays exploitation of male bodies as heroic abnegation for the nation. This paper will argue that this state-sponsored rescue was overexposed in mass media as part of a strategic governmental tactic that broadcasts a deadly conundrum of exploitation as if it were a normalized male duty carried out by proud bearers of patriotic values. This tactic allowed for uncritical consumption of these images, reinforcing structural inequalities in which the weaker forces sustaining corporate power of highly profitable mining companies were embraced as the masculine symbols of the nation. By framing them as "heroes", an inhuman neo-liberal system of production managed to elude accountability, praising the patriotic values of the miners not in solidarity with the worker, but rather as yet another denial and erasure of workers' rights.

NWSA 2011 ANNUAL CONFERENCE
435. Sexualizing the Political: A Feminist Erotic Poetry Workshop

12:15 to 1:30 pm • Level 2: Savannah 1

Poetry allows access to complex worlds outside of the dichotomous constructions of bodies, sexuality, and love. Feminist erotic poetry asks: What is erotic? What realities of body, power, and cultural performance are embraced or discouraged in erotic work? How can we use poetry to explore the messy, challenging and ever-shifting world of desire? How can feminist erotic poetry be a place of transformation? Located inside the theoretical framework of Audre Lorde’s essays “Poetry is Not a Luxury” and “The Uses of the Erotic,” this workshop will explore these questions and more as we read, write, and share feminist erotic poetry.

PARTICIPANTS:
Recovering Black Women’s Voices and Lives: Integrating Research, Teaching, Professional Service and Outreach, and New Possibilities for Actualizing Women’s Studies
DeVeanna S. Fulton Minor, University of Alabama
This presentation explores the act of integrating research, teaching and service by discussing the development of the “Recovering Black Women’s Voices and Lives” Symposium series at the University of Alabama. This exemplifies an approach to marrying research, teaching, and service in Women’s Studies. Inspired by the recovery of a serialized novel, A Tale of New England Life or A Mother and Her Son, Sowing and Reaping, published anonymously in 1860, the course and symposium were developed so that students, scholars and community members could study the diverse intellectual and creative approaches that address historical and literary research on African American women.

Re-defining Islam through the Voices of Non-literate Moroccan Women
Maha Marouan, University of Alabama
This presentation is based on a historiographic project that seeks to explore religious and cultural identities of non-literate Moroccan women through the use of oral narratives collected from women in Morocco and the Diaspora. Moroccan women’s stories of their own lives provide counter-narratives to a historical discourse that has been traditionally male and middle-class and that has constructed Moroccan national identity as strictly Muslim and Arab. These stories are told by non-literate women whose voices are marginalized and systematically excluded from public accounts despite the fact that these women’s stories provide significant and challenging versions of Moroccan history.

“In the Aftermath of the Haitian Crisis: The Problem of Sustaining Transnational Feminist Solidarit(ies)”
Jennifer Shoaff, University of Alabama
Following the Haitian Earthquake on January 12, 2010, Haitian migrant women living in a batey (a former sugar-company labor camp) in the northwest Dominican Republic mobilized immediately to contact loved ones across the border, and pool resources. The crisis in Haiti, however, was met two weeks later with an internal crisis for Haitian migrant families as the Dominican state succeeded in ratifying the jus solis doctrine of the Constitution, denying citizenship to children born of Haitian descent. In this paper, I argue that transnational feminist scholarship must remain attentive to the experiences of Haitian women whose daily realities link the crisis point in Haiti and the border region.

NWSA 2011 ANNUAL CONFERENCE
What does 21st Century feminism look like? What are the issues that are or should be shaping its direction? How are global movements of people and ideas changing our theoretical lenses, our political and economic realities, our cultural productions and representations, our forms and foci of activist engagements as well as the tools we use and criteria on which we base our knowledge claims?

SUBTHEMES:

- Revolutionary Futures
  What are the implications of contemporary economic and political crises for envisioning and enacting a feminist future?

- Traveling Theory
  How is the transnational flow of people and ideas reshaping feminist thinking, scholarship, and engagements?

- Social Networks, Power and Change
  How do we build and utilize social networks (virtual and actual) to create a feminist future?

- Decolonizing Knowledge
  What are the tools we use to release and utilize subjugated knowledge? What are the bases for our knowledge claims?

- Creative Awakenings
  How might we re-imagine artistic and creative productions and representations as a source of political and social transformation?
At the forefront of new directions in feminist scholarship, Signs publishes pathbreaking articles that address gender, race, culture, class, nation, and sexuality.
