Mission

The National Women’s Studies Association leads the field of women’s studies in education and social transformation.
Our members actively pursue a just world in which all persons can develop to their fullest potential—one free from ideologies, systems of privilege or structures that oppress or exploit some for the advantage of others. In support of their work, we believe:

- Women’s studies are vital to education; Women’s studies are comparative, global, intersectional, and interdisciplinary;
- Scholarship, activism, and teaching are inseparable elements of a single whole.

We are further committed to a vision of education and scholarship that includes:

- Faculty, students, centers, other campus organizations, and community scholars;
- The exchange of regional, national, and international scholars; and
- Critical reflection and dialogue among community organizations on the social meaning and use in women’s and gender studies broadly conceived.
Letter from the President & Executive Director

As President and Executive Director of the National Women's Studies Association, we are pleased to provide this inaugural report on the key activities, programs, and accomplishments of the Association over the past year. During this period NWSA has taken important steps at creating new professional development resources, being a voice for the field to wider audiences, and strengthening and expanding our signature Women of Color Leadership Project program.

We responded to our members' requests for field statements that would strengthen and support their work in women's studies. Our forthcoming statement on tenure and promotion builds on the Association’s early efforts in this area and will offer a broad, field-level view of how to assess research, teaching, and service in women's and gender studies that can be used in conjunction with specific institutional requirements.

We also worked to share information about the field more broadly, partnering with the Feminist Majority Foundation and Ms. Magazine to highlight the field's growth and changes as part of a Fall 2012 anniversary issue of the magazine. The special section featured a story about NWSA and its transformation over time. NWSA members also contributed stories. Over the summer, Allison was quoted in the New York Times Magazine story about the global export of Cosmopolitan magazine. Finally, NWSA developed an app for the 2012 conference that was widely embraced by registrants. Perhaps more important, the app creates a digital, searchable record of the event freely available to users worldwide.

NWSA continues its longstanding commitment to strengthening support for women of color in the academy and in the organization by expanding and extending its Women of Color Leadership Project. In 2012 we doubled the number of participants in the program to 39. What's more, we invited prior year participants to return for another year to attend complimentary pre-conference sessions. Anecdotally we know that this program offers a sustaining and intellectually engaging community for its participants, and we are committed to maintaining it over time.

The theme of our first annual report draws on the theme of our November 2012 conference in Oakland, California: Imagining a Feminist Future. These reflections on our work over the past year also highlight the ways we are planning for the future of our field, and engaging in multi-faceted efforts to support your work.

Feminism Unbound: Imagining a Feminist Future built on our conversations about Feminist Transformations in 2011 by examining the ways feminist scholarship is transgressing such boundaries as public/private, gender conformity and sexuality, nationalism, disability, race, ethnicity, class and culture. It encouraged us to explore our vision of 21st century feminism.

The conference inspired thought and debate among members. We highlight some post-conference blog posts below:

Stephanie Troutman reflects on the meeting’s sessions, community, and atmosphere at feministing

Alison Piepmeier finds the connection she needs for her new research . . . sitting right next to her at Baxter Sez

Tracy Hawkins shares detailed highlights of sessions she attended including publishing in academic journals, refreshing the Intro to Women’s Studies course, and the standing room only session on Nicki Minaj at Transgressing Boundaries

John Erickson explores the role of men in NWSA at Feminism and Religion

The thrill of volunteering at the NWSA conference for undergraduate Ndeya Walker at Ndeyasayswhat

Annual Conference by the Numbers

NWSA’s annual conference is the only annual meeting in the US exclusively dedicated to showcasing the latest feminist scholarship, and is the Association’s largest programmatic activity. However, it features many different events and activities over four days designed to serve members across the professional spectrum and to reflect our organizational commitments to diversity and accessibility.
MEMBERSHIP

Individual and institutional membership in NWSA remains strong despite broader financial pressures in higher education. NWSA had more than 1,700 individual and more than 300 institutional members in 2012.

At its June 2012 Governing Council meeting, board members agreed to maintain dues levels for 2013. The Governing Council also made important decisions about future conferences in 2014, settling on San Juan, Puerto Rico in 2014 and Montreal, Canada in 2016, exciting destinations that address NWSA’s commitments to broadening the geographic scope of our work. These sites join our existing roster of Cincinnati, Ohio for 2013 and Milwaukee, Wisconsin for 2015.

INNOVATIONS

The National Women’s Studies Association had an important year for programmatic and technological innovations. Programmatically, NWSA built on the success of its Women of Color Leadership Project (WoCLP) program, which is designed to increase the number of women of color students an faculty within the field of women’s studies and women’s centers and, consequently, to have an impact on the levels of participation and power by women of color in the field of women’s studies and women’s centers and in the Association itself.

For the first time in 2012, the WoCLP included a second-year option, which allowed 20 of the previous year’s participants to return to the Women’s Center and Program Administration and Development Pre-Conferences, in addition to 30 first-year participants for 2012. The project includes professional and leadership development sessions and fosters a strong network among participants. NWSA also extends complimentary registration and membership to participants.

FIELD LEADERSHIP

We were proud to introduce the first NWSA conference app in 2012, a new technology that was widely praised and tweeted onsite. User data shows that more than nearly half of all attendees downloaded the app, making an astonishing 18,000 visits to the dashboard page during the conference. NWSA 2012 also featured our social media campaign, “Why Women’s Studies?” Many conference attendees had their photos taken with provocative answers to the question written on a white board.

NWSA supported a robust series of field leadership activities in 2012, providing support for members across the professional spectrum in addition to those that regularly take place at the annual conference. For example, in May the national office organized a complimentary webinar, “What Can You Do with a Women’s Studies Degree?” that featured three women’s studies graduates working in corporate and nonprofit settings who offered advice to current students about how to market their women’s studies training.

In June, the Association organized a meeting of its Field Leadership Working Group to discuss developing new tenure and promotion guidelines intended to update the existing Defining Women’s Studies Scholarship (Pryse, 1999).

Finally, in September NWSA coordinated a meeting of the women’s studies doctoral program chairs. This annual event is designed to promote collaboration among the programs and support field building as it relates to graduate education, curriculum development, and job placement.

This committee’s work builds on a 1999 National Women’s Studies Association publication, Defining Women’s Studies Scholarship: A Statement of the National Women’s Studies Association Task Force on Faculty Roles and Rewards (Pryse 1999). Much has changed in the field since 1999, including strong growth at the graduate level, with more than 16 doctoral programs and 40 master’s programs nationally. The doctoral programs not only hire, promote, and tenure faculty—while educating future faculty members—but they also produce much of the field’s newest scholarship. Therefore the time is right to take a new look at tenure and promotion in women’s and gender studies, particularly since practices for evaluating women’s studies scholars may not fully reflect changes in the field nationally and locally.

This project also grows out of recent work by the National Women’s Studies Association on civic engagement. The resulting white paper, Women’s Studies as Civic Engagement: Research and Recommendations pointed to the need for a new field statement on tenure and promotion in women’s and gender studies because effective civic engagement pedagogies, while frequently identified as a central goal in higher education, too often fail to count in the academic reward system. Consequently we want to address the gap between stated institutional values and tenure and promotion practices.
Dr. Barbara Winslow is currently Associate Professor (to be promoted to full professor in August, 2013) in the secondary education department and women’s studies program at Brooklyn College. Dr. Winslow has taught at Brooklyn College since 1999 and founded the Shirley Chisholm Project of Brooklyn Women’s Activism 1945 to the Present in 2006.

Dr. Winslow specializes in women’s suffrage, US and England, post 1945 feminism in the US, Shirley Chisholm, and gender in the social studies curriculum K-12. Dr. Winslow’s book This is Fighting Shirley Chisholm: Urban Liberalism, Feminism and the Black Freedom Struggle, will be published in 2013 by Westview Press. Dr. Winslow co-edited Clio in the Classroom: A Guide for Teaching US Women’s History, with Carol Berkin and Margaret Crocco), published in 2009. Dr. Winslow is currently writing an article on 25 years of teaching women’s history in the schools as well as a piece on the impact of Hurricane Sandy on Brooklyn schools and Brooklyn students.

Dr. Winslow has been an activist for over 50 years including founding the Seattle Radical Women in 1967 and one of the first task forces on teaching women’s studies to criminal offenders. Her daughters also practice feminist social justice activism. In 2010, Dr. Winslow received Brooklyn Borough President’s Women’s Herstory Month Award, the Lucy Burns Award, and in 2011, she received the National Council for Research on Women, Thirty Women Leaders Award.

Dr. Winslow received her BA from University of Washington, MA in US labor history University of Washington, MA in US-British labor history, University of Warwick, Coventry England, and PhD University of Washington, US-British women’s history.

Name one thing your vision of a feminist future would include: Joy and passion.

BARBARA WINSLOW, ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR, BROOKLYN COLLEGE
Dr. Mignonette Chiu is currently in her second year of the Dorothy Haecker Post-Doctoral Fellowship at the University of Missouri. Dr. Chiu participated in the 2012 NWSA Women of Color Leadership Project.

Dr. Chiu specializes in immigration/migration, transnationalism, global/globalization studies, ethnic studies, critical race studies, and Asian American/diaspora studies.

Dr. Chiu is working on a book project, The Crowning of Miss Chinese International: Beauty Pageants and the Imagining of Global Community which expands on earlier research by addressing the problem of the Asian transnational subject as heterosexual construct. She is also developing an article on migration and racialized masculinities and another on immigration as a feminist issue.

Name one thing your vision of a feminist future would include: From experience, I know two things: I need community and the community that I need and want—a compassionate and generous community formed around social justice principles—often needs to be sustained if not made entirely anew.

Dr. Chiu incorporates activism into her life and work in different ways: her personal politics, her academic scholarship, and her teaching. She continues to engage in a great deal of organized political protest. Her scholarship is also a form of engaged feminist activism that also addresses Asian American issues, as well as immigration, citizenship, and globalization.

Dr. Chiu received her BA English from Wesleyan University; an MA in international comparative education from Teachers College, Columbia University; an M. Phil. in political science from Columbia University; and a PhD in political science from Columbia University.
