

Nathaniel Teti
Statoil

Nate is an experienced energy policy and strategic communications professional with a diverse skill set and broad background. Nate holds a Master's degree in Public Administration (public policy focus) and a law degree (graduating near the top of his class). Earlier in his career, Nate gained valuable insight into the legislative process and policy making through various stints on Capitol Hill and with Congressional Quarterly. On the Hill, Nate worked with both Senate and House committee staff on a broad set of domestic and foreign policy matters as well as parliamentary procedure. During law school, Nate clerked at a small law firm in Washington, DC, assisting clients in the areas of government affairs, small business federal contracting, and trade association management.

Nate was a summer associate at the law firm of Sutherland, Asbill, and Brennan, and joined the firm after graduation. Nate worked in the energy and environmental group at Sutherland, representing an array of clients, from large multi-nationals to investment banks to entrepreneurial small businesses. Nate's clients primarily fell into two categories: (1) energy producers and project developers (upstream, midstream, electricity, and renewable); and (2) investment banks (major institutional investors). While at Sutherland, Nate served clients in litigation, before regulatory agencies, as a government affairs and project advisor, and on matters of international law. Nate also spent considerable time building the firm's practice in the areas of climate change and upstream oil and gas production (both in the Gulf of Mexico and unconventional resources onshore).

Nate joined Statoil in 2009 as was an integral component of the establishment of the Washington office. The office was sanctioned to provide Statoil with a presence on policy and regulatory matters in Washington relevant for the company's North American and international business units.